SuviCa testing cancer drug on the fly

BY JEFF THOMAS

Rack one up for the fruit flies — and the concept of involving undergrads in front-line research, as well.

Both the flies and the students who work with them were instrumental in bringing Boulder biotechnology company SuviCa Inc. roughly $1.5 million in federal funding to develop a treatment for head and neck cancer last fall. The University of Colorado Boulder technology transfer company, headed by Tin Tin Su, its chief science officer and a CU professor, has a drug candidate known now as SVC112 that helps prevent regrowth of cancerous cells following radiation therapy.

While at least a couple years away from any human testing, Su said the money will help the fledgling company develop the drug as far as financially feasible. Su said the Phase II Small Business Innovation Research (SBIR) contract from the National Cancer Institute may help get the drug to the beginning of human testing, although certainly other funding would be necessary at that point.

"We would like to keep it as long as possible," said Su about the company's first drug candidate. "We still have a lot of work in proof of concept in the lab and in animal models, and we're hoping to raise money to get there.

"If we get appropriate funding, and the data looks good, I would say about two years (until the drug could begin to be tested on people). That's an educated guess."

SVC112 is a small molecule that targets ribosomes, which create proteins inside of cells. Essentially, the researchers hope to inhibit cancerous cells that have been treated by radiation from replicating themselves, a far too common occurrence after radiation treatment.

The drug could have more far-ranging application, as Su said working on neck and head (not brain) cancer was more of a means to an end, as SVC112 and other drug candidates at SuviCa may have more extensive application.

Tin Tin Su, a University of Colorado Boulder professor who serves as chief science officer for technology-transfer company SuviCa Inc., works on a drug to battle head and neck cancer.

GLENN ASAKAWA / UNIVERSITY OF COLORADO

"You don't hear a lot about it (neck and head cancer) and, because it's often neglected, patients have greater needs for a new therapy," Su said. "The specificity (of the cancer) comes less from the drug" and more from a business model suggested by regulatory paths.

The use of fruit flies — or Drosophila melanogaster for those in the know — in medical research is not new, but certainly Su's approach in bringing in undergraduates to this first phase of potential drug identification is raising some eyebrows.

"That is our first line of attack, and the reason is they (fruit flies) share about 70 percent disease-relevant genes with us," she said. "They are very easy to manipulate; we can change genes in fruit flies almost at will. It's cheap and fast."

Undergraduate evaluation of the fruit fly screening was very much a part of identifying SVC112, and the courses designed by Su for her students have attracted funding by the Howard Hughes Institute to forward the curriculum to reach a larger student population at CU.

"It's getting a lot of attention," Su said. "Giving the students hands-on experience in doing front-line research really gives them better perspective than traditional lab work."

The idea also was crucial in putting together a rather unique and talented SuviCa team, as well. CEO Judy Hemberger, who was co-founder and chief operating officer of Pharmion Corp. prior to its sale to Celgene for $2.9 billion, said the unique screening technique, and its advantages in inexpensively putting drug candidates into the pipeline, initially drew her to the company.

"I've probably served on 19 different boards," said Hemberger, who has more than 30 years of experience in the pharmaceutical industry, with expertise including clinical development, global regulatory and early commercialization. "When I saw what Tin Tin's techniques offered, I was on board."

Today, Hemberger points to a uniquely integrated team of researchers and managers well versed in early drug development as the feature that really makes SuviCa, founded in 2010, really hum.

"That's one of the things that brings this team together: the desire to create low-cost, effective cancer treatments."

— Judy Hemberger, SuviCa CEO

For instance, Bert Pronk, SuviCa's vice president for preclinical development who has more than 25 years' of experience in research and drug development for various oncology indications in academic and industry environments, also was instrumental in developing SVC112. The SuviCa team also includes clinicians and scientists at CU-Boulder, the University of Colorado Cancer Center, CU Anschutz Medical Campus and Colorado State University, several of whom have published a Phase I clinical study (dosage response) on a similar drug inhibiting post-radiation cancer cell growth.

"We've always been able to use money very, very effectively," Hemberger said. "That's one of the things that brings this team together: the desire to create low-cost, effective cancer treatments."

Su's research in her lab at CU-Boulder also may have revealed something many cancer specialists were not aware of, a communication between dying cells and their nearby counterparts. "We still don't understand how they work," she said, "but they (appear to) send signals to their neighbors, telling them not to die."

But Su is hopeful that the current screening process matched with top-end researchers may have a solution.

"We're building a so-called pipeline," she said. "We have other new entrants at different states and are tweaking them now."

Dr. Nelson Trujillo, a cardiologist at Boulder Community Health, is the first in the area to begin using the Synergy stent. The device is pre-medicated, which reduces scarring and incidents of re-stenting.

JONATHAN CASTNER/FOR BIZWEST

Heart stent reduces risk of complications

BY MICHELLE LEJEUNE

Until just a few months ago, more than half of the patients with heart disease who had arterial stents installed to maintain the flow of blood during an angioplasty procedure could expect complications such as blood clots, which could lead to a heart attack and even death — the very reason they were in the doctor's care in the first place.

It's a grim merry-go-round heart patients don't have to ride any more thanks to a new treatment offered by Boulder Community Health, the only hospital along the Front Range that offers this treatment. Developed by Boston Scientific Corp., the Synergy stent treatment combines old stent technology with a way of limiting the amount of time that scar-tissue medication stays in the system. Boston Scientific provides medical solutions for patients with conditions that range from heart problems to issues with chronic pain.

Dr. Nelson Trujillo, a cardiologist at Boulder Community Health, said the Synergy stent is a "new generation of stent. A lot of problems with stents are related to how they heal. With the technology on this new device, it really improves the heart's ability to heal. It will lead to people needing less medication in the long term with a better result. I'm pleased and proud for being the first to put these in for our community."

Stents are tiny mesh tubes that doctors use to keep clogged arteries open, allowing blood to flow freely to the heart. They are designed to stay permanently in the patient's body.

Using a stent to keep a plaque-hardened artery open is not new; they have been used for more than a decade in patients with heart disease, but they fail in two ways: through scarring and blood-clot formation, Trujillo said.

The typical stent, made of platinum chromium, can be used with or without medication, depending on the patient's needs. In the first generation of stents, scar tissue sometimes would grow over the stent. In the next big innovation with stents, medication was added to prevent scar tissue and resulting re-narrowing. The medication delivered, Everolimus, is related to chemotherapy agents and comes from Pacific yew trees. Everolimus is added to a polymer, and the stent is coated with it "so that there are parts of the artery that get exposed to the polymer that don't need to be," Trujillo said.

While this system works, it slows down healing inside the artery and increases blood-clot risk. Patients are exposed to blood-thinning medications for long periods in order to prevent development of blood clots that can lead to heart attacks. But taking blood thinners is tricky; too big of a dose can cause major bleeding, while not enough means blood clots can still form.

The new stent solves that problem. "With the Synergy stent, the polymer and the medication (it's the same medication, Everolimus), are limited to the outside stent structure so it's opposed to the blood vessel, so it is applied in a limited way just in the places it needs to be," Trujillo said. "That limits the amount of inflammation that occurs, letting the vessel heal faster and more efficiently,"

"A lot of problems with stents are related to how they heal. With the technology on this new device, it really improves the heart's ability to heal."

— Dr. Nelson Trujillo,
Boulder Community Health

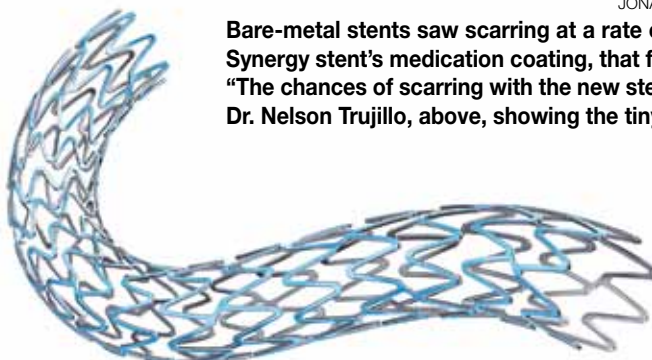

He added that the Synergy stent is different in the way the scar tissue preventing medication, which is attached to the stent, is delivered. Older-generation stents do have medicine that aids in scar-tissue prevention, but the medicine stays in the body for a long, undeterminable amount of time. This slows healing inside the artery. Trujillo said getting ahead of scar-tissue formation is especially important in the tiny blood vessels of the heart. Most stents are 2 to 4 millimeters wide to fit the arteries into which they are designed to go. As a comparison, the tip of a ballpoint pen, which is roughly 4 millimeters, would be a large artery. Scarring can cause blockages.

Scarring does not always happen,

JONATHAN CASTNER/FOR BIZWEST

Bare-metal stents saw scarring at a rate of 15 percent. With the Synergy stent's medication coating, that falls to 6 percent. "The chances of scarring with the new stent are 2 percent," said Dr. Nelson Trujillo, above, showing the tiny device.

© 2015 BOSTON SCIENTIFIC CORPORATION OR ITS AFFILIATES. ALL RIGHTS RESERVED. USED WITH PERMISSION BY BOSTON SCIENTIFIC CORPORATION

Trujillo said, but the new stent makes it much less likely. "We measure scarring based on what we see on an angiogram, what shows up in the clinics, and who needs to be re-stented," he said. Bare-metal stents saw scarring at a rate of 15 percent. With a medication coating, that falls to 6 percent.

"The chances of scarring with the new stent are 2 percent," Trujillo said. He compared this new way of delivering medication to time-released medications.

Although the stent was developed in the United States, it has been available in European markets for two years. In 2010, there were 454,000 insertions of a coronary-artery stent, according to the federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. Prior to this year, Trujillo calculated, he has installed 100 to 200 stents a year.

Health and fitness: There's a local app for that

BY TOMMY WOOD

Boulder has been a hotbed of innovation in the medical industry and for app development. Those industries are starting to merge, as a number of health and fitness apps have been built in the Boulder Valley recently.

They range from trackers for both fertility and pregnancy to anatomy encyclopedias and an app that's designed to keep runners safe at all times.

The app industry is exploding not only in Boulder but worldwide. The University of Alabama-Birmingham predicted that app downloads will produce upward of $77 billion in revenue in 2017, and the tech magazine Wired reported that the total market size for the industry will approach $143 billion this year.

With that in mind, here are a few of the best from the Boulder Valley:

Kindara is a fertility app, designed to help women better understand their bodies and plan either when to get pregnant or avoid pregnancy. Users input data, including body temperature, the consistency of their cervical fluid, their menstrual cycle and their sex life. Kindara then uses that data to track on a day-by-day basis when each user is fertile, or not. Women also can connect with each other on the app for pregnancy advice, or simply to share stories or get support. Kindara is free in the App Store.

If Kindara is about helping women get pregnant, iBirth takes over from there. Designed for doctors, midwives and patients, it aims to be a comprehensive, upbeat pregnancy resource. iBirth sends users daily inspirational notes from leading pregnancy doctors, tracks contractions so expectant moms don't have to, provides full nutrition guides and meal plans (even for vegetarian, gluten- or dairy-free diets) and compiles questions for their doctors. iBirth is free in the App Store, but offers in-app purchases.

Fitter Faster was developed to make getting in shape quick and simple. It's an audio workout program, marketed as a "personal trainer in your ear." Its exercise programs are tailored to users' needs and are designed by top exercise scientists. Fitter Faster is still in beta but can be downloaded from its website.

The University of Alabama-Birmingham predicted that app downloads will produce upward of $77 billion in revenue in 2017, and the tech magazine Wired reported that the total market size for the industry will approach $143 billion this year.

Biophone Field, developed by Broomfield-based Novum Concepts, is designed to connect first responders such as firefighters or emergency medical technicians in the field with the hospital to which they are sending their patients. The first responders capture photos, video and patient information such as EKGs, injuries and more on their cell phones, then transmit that data to the hospital using a secure, HIPAA-compliant transmission. Biophone Field is free in the App Store, but the receiver must have downloaded the client Biophone Base, which is a subscription service.

Genes for Good is a Facebook app developed to aid a study by the University of Michigan, with the goal of getting tens of thousands of people involved in genetic research for medical advancement. Users answer health-related questions, input information about their background and track their health through the app. In addition to the medical research, researchers will tell users about their genetic history through the study.

AnatomyMapp is designed to be a comprehensive educational resource for anyone — including doctors, nurses and students — who needs to know human musculoskeletal anatomy. It features 364 flashcards that cover every part of the human anatomy, with multiple styles of built-in quizzes to accommodate different learning styles and audio pronunciations of every muscle. AnatomyMapp is available for $19.99 in the App Store and on Google Play.

Fit Trip was developed to take people's stationary bike, treadmill or rowing workout out of the gym and to wherever they want it. Users choose what visual track they want the app to display — hiking in the Alps, running on the beach, biking through rolling hills — and lose themselves in that and their workout. It also features a heart-rate monitor that tracks all workout-related measureables. Fit Trip is free in the App Store.

RunRaegis is a running app that has all of the conventional distance, heart rate and calorie tracking, but its bread and butter is its safety features. It's designed to make sure users are safe when they're running. Users input emergency contacts who automatically are notified every time the user goes out for a run. The contacts can track the runner on GPS and be alerted if the runner isn't back by a predetermined time. There's a panic button for runners that will immediately alert 911 and their emergency contacts, and broadcast that alert to other users of the app. RunRaegis is subscription-based. It costs $4.99 a month, $19.99 for six months and $24.99 for a year.
