Ticket Tips

Price advice for your next event

By Beth Potter

If you want to figure out if Bon Jovi (or any national entertainment act) can make money in Northern Colorado, Bob Herrfeldt at The Ranch Events Complex is your man.

Herrfeldt is the go-to guy when it comes to booking events at the Budweiser Events Center, part of the Larimer County Fairgrounds complex at 5290 Arena Circle in Loveland. He's the one who runs the numbers to make sure acts such as ZZ Top, Rod Stewart or Larry the Cable Guy can sell enough tickets to fill the 7,200-seat venue.

Since Bon Jovi is an expensive act to book, and since tickets for most events at The Ranch typically sell for $45 to $75, even if the concert sold out, The Ranch likely would just break even, Herrfeldt said. After some simple calculations, Herrfeldt decided to turn down a recent opportunity to host the band.

"Northern Colorado has a good, active entertainment market, and people want to see shows, but it has to be good value,"

Herrfeldt said. "We call it 'right-pricing.'"

Whether it's selling tickets to a former headliner rock band or to a corporate function, event-planning managers along the northern Front Range and Wyoming can help you make it happen – with some "right-pricing" tips.

If you plan to host your own event and charge attendees, take some tips from these folks' playbooks:

Use pricing strategies such as discount codes to drive early ticket sales. So many activities are planned in Northern Colorado year-round that residents often wait until the day of an event to make decisions on what to attend, said Amanda Miller, owner of The Place Setting Co., an event-planning company in Fort Collins. To get ahead of that last-minute pattern, Miller said, create incentives to get people to commit themselves, with a goal to sell out events at least a month in advance. Not only do you need to consider discounts, but also plan carefully to avoid competing with other event unnecessarily, Miller said.

Venue pricing is important. It may sound obvious, but the difference between package pricing and a la carte pricing may end up costing you thousands of dollars. With package pricing, once you receive a price estimate, it's not going to change too much, event planners say. A venue that uses a la carte pricing usually offers lower prices, but then charges for additional individual items, from chairs and tables to a second microphone, planners say.

Officials at the Cam-PLEX Multi-Event Facilities' ticket office at 1635 Reata Drive in Gillette, Wyo., use package pricing to coordinate any and all pieces of an event at the 1,100-acre venue, said Shelly Ailts, the facilities coordinator.

Ailts works with clients to make sure they have everything they might need, from a theater, race track and ice arena to RV spaces for a camping rally. The county-owned venue offers 55 rentable rooms in seven buildings.

"Do we coordinate the tickets, or do they coordinate the tickets?" Ailts asked rhetorically. "Catering is different for every venue, too."

Ailts believes the package pricing strategy gives her clients peace of mind that everything will be taken care of.

Event managers often have different rates for commercial groups, nonprofit groups, and even children's nonprofits. Rodeo groups that use the Cam-PLEX facility often can get a nonprofit rate, Ailts said. With 2,400 events every year, The Ranch in Loveland most commonly charges commercial rates to users, Herrfeldt said.

Know your market and use sponsorships to help offset costs of an event. Many events put on in the region have a major marketing and promotion aspect to them, said Tyler Brooks, operations

COURTESY LARIMER COUNTY

Indoor meeting and banquet spaces abound at The Ranch, part of the Larimer County Fairgrounds complex east of Loveland.

Ideas from event planners:

- 1 Use pricing strategies such as discount codes to drive early ticket sales.
- 2 Find out all aspects of a venue's pricing strategy – does the venue offer package pricing designed specifically for your event or is it designed to be a la carte? In other words, will you pay more at the last minute if you need two extra tables and 10 extra chairs?
- 3 Are you representing a commercial group, a nonprofit group, or a children's educational group? Ask for discounts up front, if appropriate.
- 4 Know your market and use sponsorships to help offset the cost of an event
- 5 What do similar events cost in the region?
- 6 Will you offer food at your event? What's the per-plate food and beverage cost?

manager of the Downtown Fort Collins Business Association. With that in mind, workers at the nonprofit DFCBA work hard to find the best sponsors to help promote their downtown Fort Collins events, he said. Fort Collins banks and other related businesses can benefit just as much from many of the events put on by DFCBA as the downtown businesses do, Brooks said.

If your goal is mainly marketing and promotion, you may focus on just breaking even on an event, Miller said.

Focus on what your target audience can afford to pay when putting together events, Brooks said. For example, an annual First Night Fort Collins event targeted at families cost just $12 last year. But tickets were $60 per person for the VIP event, The Summit, an exclusive tasting event built into the larger Colorado Brewers' Festival this summer, Brooks said.

What do similar events cost in the region? Brooks said organizers of the Colorado Brewers' Festival look carefully at what other beer festivals charge around the region when setting their tasting prices.

What's the per-plate food and beverage cost for the event? Most venues offer food choices at a wide range of prices. The Ranch starts with a $10 bag lunch and goes all the way up to $50 to $60 per plate for a steak dinner or wild game, Herrfeldt said. Chefs love to put together unique menus, he said, but don't let them forget your budget.

In fact, you can tell a chef at a venue what a meal budget is, and they'll almost always try to accommodate you, said Jim Walter, director of convention sales at Visit Cheyenne.

"It depends on your needs," he said, "so it's being knowledgeable about what costs may be involved and how to control your budget."

Find the right sponsor

CHEYENNE FRONTIER DAYS

Like-minded partners can boost an event's reach

By Paula Aven Gladych

Knowing your target audience and finding like-minded businesses with which you want to partner are the best ways to get sponsorships for your events.

When Planet Bluegrass first started the Telluride Bluegrass Festival, it only looked for sponsors when it needed something, like an instrument to raffle off for a contest in exchange for benefits at the festivals, said Steve Szymanski, senior vice president of Planet Bluegrass in Lyons.

"As we got into it more and more, we started having different needs and went out and found partners to help us around sustainability and lowering the impacts around the festivals," he said.

The organization wanted to lower its impact on the environment, and one of those ways was to use compostable materials.

"Sponsors became an important partner around the financial and educational aspects of what we were doing," Szymanski said. "Over the last decade or so, there has been a push toward eco products. Folks like whole foods, organic stuff."

Planet Bluegrass began picking and choosing organizations it felt would support its message of sustainability, such as natural foods and organic products.

"Most of our sponsors stay with us, which creates a problem that we can't do new sponsors," he said.

Planet Bluegrass is highly selective about who it will let sponsor one of its events.

"We don't believe in plastering logos and banners at our events. They take place in beautiful places so let nature speak the loudest," he said. "We do allow them to interact (with attendees), which is more than just seeing a name in a program. It is coming to a booth and having an interaction with folks with the purpose of educating them on what they are working on."

The organization is very serious about its brand and its message. It wants to reach people who love bluegrass music and who are also environmentally conscious.

To encourage festival attendees to visit sponsor booths, the organization developed a punch card. Visitors visit each booth and fill out a card. When the card is full, they turn it in for a prize drawing.

"It is an opportunity to have a dialogue with each of our partners. How are you going to interact with our Festivarians and get the most out of that," said Brian Eyster, vice president for communications at Planet Bluegrass.

"A festival is so much more than going to a venue to see a show," Szymanski said. "There are a lot of things going on. A community comes to the show and hangs out for a week together. We offer a deeper experience by offering other things. We have to make an effort to get people to go to the booths. It is a fun way for people to go out and learn about different aspects of the event."

He added that sponsorship is not a key part of the success of their events.

“We work with the people it makes sense to work with,” he said. “We are not trying to solicit money to run the event. That’s unique for a 40-year-old festival.”

Younger festivals and events are always looking for new income streams.

For the organizers of the Bolder Boulder, sponsorships are an essential part of the event being able to be staged in the way it is, said Cliff Bosley, race director.

Many fundraisers and events casually thank sponsors, or they are mentioned in passing, but in the world of the Bolder Boulder, “sponsorships are an integral part of bringing the race experience back to the participants,” Bosley said. “But because the total cost of staging the event costs more than the registration fees the event generates, sponsors are bridging the financial gap to make the event occur at the high level we do it.”

Finding sponsors is a very competitive business, he said. There are a lot of events and a lot of competition for the same businesses to sponsor events. Planning early is a big thing. Many organizations make their donation and sponsorship decisions at the beginning of the calendar year. If you don’t submit your requests early “You’ve got to know what they want. That’s how you keep them coming back. If they send a check and don’t get value out of it or feel special, they won’t come back.”

enough, your event will be left behind.

Tom Hirsig, chief executive and president of Cheyenne Frontier Days, said the key to a good sponsorship program is understanding your sponsors and what they want from you and your event and then offering different sponsorship packages that meet those needs.

Some sponsors want recognition with banners and advertisements. Others just want to entertain potential clients at the event. They don’t care about banners and posters, he said.

Hirsig encouraged planners of new events to “be flexible with your sponsorships and to the needs of the sponsor.

“You’ve got to know what they want. That’s how you keep them coming back,” he said. “If they send a check and don’t get value out of it or feel special, they won’t come back.”

What makes it tough for new event organizers is that most potential sponsors want to see what the event is. Event organizers should take the time to come up with a great concept statement to show potential sponsors “This is what our event is going to look like,” he said.

The biggest thing an event organizer can offer sponsors is visibility, said Darren Rudloff, CEO at Visit Cheyenne, “It’s usually being associated with a good, fun event that attracts community members that may become customers of the sponsor, or perhaps the sponsor needs to be seen as a community partner or player and wants to be involved to get the good word of mouth out about them,” he said.

Like Hirsig, Rudloff believes the key is to target the kinds of sponsors that best match your event. If you are holding a 5-K run, a fast food restaurant may not be the best sponsor; try a natural-foods grocer or sports drink manufacturer instead.

You can book a rooftop deck with views in Fort Collins or Boulder, a theater with live entertainment in Johnstown, or a piece of history at area museums in Cheyenne and Longmont.

For your next event, unique locations abound along the Front Range and in Wyoming.

A “still-feels-new” rooftop deck space at the Lincoln Center, 417 W. Magnolia St., in Fort Collins, is the most sought-after space in the well-loved venue, said Eddie Modec, conference services manager. You can look out through the leafy surroundings to other downtown buildings from the deck, which can hold as many as 250 people with theater-style seating.

corporate cocktail events, weddings and the like, Modec said. Also available at the Lincoln Center (although perhaps not as unique) are a 1,200-seat performance center, a 225-seat theater and two interior ballroom spaces, all remodeled in 2011. An outdoor terrace on the main entrance floor has played host to memorial services and wedding cocktail receptions.

“The Lincoln Center is a unique environment. The dynamic helps guests to interact with each other,” Modec said.

In Boulder, the outdoor rooftop deck on the fifth floor of the University Memorial Center near Broadway and Euclid Avenue on campus still can take your breath away with an unobstructed view of the Flatirons ... or maybe it’s just from all the stairs you climbed to get up there.

Rembrandt Yard Art Gallery and Event Center at 1301 Spruce St. in Boulder offers floor-to-ceiling window views of the Flatirons from its indoor third-floor meeting space. Organizers rent the space out to various nonprofit groups, companies and individuals, many of whom also coordinate with the Boulder Theater on events, said Morgan Fox, director of sales and special events at the venue. For example, Naturally Boulder, the local natural-products trade group, holds its annual Pitch Slam event at Rembrandt Yard, where young companies compete for prize money to help them grow. After an all-day meeting at Rembrandt Yard, the group moves to Boulder Theater, a block away at 2032 14th St., for an award ceremony.

“Live, professional entertainment (helps) break up the meeting and inspire creativity.”

Allison Clark, events manager, Candlelight Dinner Playhouse

Event organizers can post information on the iconic Boulder Theater marquee outside, too.

There’s a stage at the Boulder Theater for performances, but Candlelight Dinner Playhouse near Loveland does one better, offering professional actors if you want to book them, said Allison Clark, events manager at the venue at 4747 Marketplace Drive in Johnstown.

“Live, professional entertainment (helps) break up the meeting and inspire creativity,” Clark said. “Sophisticated hospitality is our business, and we are happy to bring you that however we can.”

Film festivals and fundraisers have been among the venue’s customers, Clark said.

To book a piece of history, look no further than the Longmont Museum and Cultural Center, which just opened a new auditorium in June at 400 Quail Road in Longmont. The 250-seat auditorium includes a stage, grand piano and technical equipment.

Best of all when booking space might be the two-story atrium outside the auditorium, with its high, open windows, said

Joan Harrold, marketing and development manager at the museum. There’s also has an outdoor courtyard where it hosts summer concerts.

“Being a museum, it has the historical context, and that makes it a special place,” Harrold said. “We’ve had a ton of interest.”

The Cheyenne Frontier Days Old West Museum also hosts numerous special events throughout the year, as well as being open to the public—with 30,000 visitors. Museum officials recently brought in historic carriages, which now limit events to up to 100 because of fire-code regulations, said Kristin Custis, event coordinator.

“You name it, and we host it,” said Custis. “We’re trying to narrow that scope a little bit because the fire code has made our numbers a little small.”

Visitors love soaking up the history of the popular annual Cheyenne Frontier Days in the museum, at 4610 Carey Ave. in Cheyenne, as well as the Wyoming history exhibits.

While the majority of events are held inside, there’s a pretty courtyard outside that faces the botanic gardens across the street. Children’s birthday parties can be accommodated in the children’s gallery, which features a special scavenger hunt designed just for them, said Custis.

Book early for the popular site, Custis said; availability usually is about six months in advance and virtually nil during Frontier Days, scheduled for July 22-31, 2016.

Video becoming indispensable marketing tool at events

By Jeff Thomas

There's a great scene at the end of the "Pirates of Silicon Valley" film of 1999, in which a giant image of Bill Gates, played by Anthony Michael Hall, is staring down at Steve Jobs from a huge screen streaming video.

Microsoft has just bought a big hunk of Apple, allowing the company to continue operations.

Ironic, of course, given the last 16 years of the corporate fortunes of Microsoft and Apple combined with the fact that this could occur at any given conference in any given day. Less ironic, of course, in that it did forecast the advent of streaming video, pervasive throughout our society today.

While that kind of streaming video is pervasive through big conventions and shows (try avoiding giant videos of chief executive Brian Krzanich at any Intel affair), that's not the biggest use of video. In fact, it's the little things that make video a must at most trade shows and conventions.

"I think the biggest thing we do for trade shows are videos that companies use to catch someone's eye" as they walk past a booth, said Andrew Trigg, account executive at Advanced Media Services in Fort Collins.

"There won't be any sound, because it's not going to be in a space where you can use that. They are just eye-catching visuals and on-screen text. You give them just enough information for them to want to talk to you."

Of course, running a video on a large television or monitor is a piece of cake today, easily accomplished with a laptop or even a smartphone. Creating such videos is going to take a bit of an effort, however, something that obviously needs to be addressed well before the trade show season.

A great deal of the video that ends up being eye-catching on the trade show floor, Trigg said, is really part of a comprehensive look at employing video as an overall marketing tool.

"We were doing video for an engineering firm that was kind of in the middle on the oil and gas industry – midstream logistical stuff," Trigg said. "One of the videos that was developed came from photos representing every step along the chain of that industry – solutions to common problems.

“But it told a story that visually appealed to a lot of people at the trade shows.”

This is just one of the many forms that video can help in events of all types, and just one reason that video is consuming more and more of even everyday marketing efforts – enough for some pundits to call 2015 the year of video marketing.

In Wyoming, Dan Wielding, co-owner of DGW Video Productions, has his hands full most any given day, especially given that a great deal of his business is format conversion. But on Oct. 22, he will be busier than most days, simultaneously filming Cheyenne’s first local “Dancing With the Stars” show while doing a band documentary in Casper.

While the Dancing debut will necessitate streaming video – including live shots of the judges, and close-ups of the dancers, he said the primary business of video production at events and trade shows is more documentary than live.

“There is more of that live-streaming work coming around,” said Wielding, noting that a local high school recently used the effect so that each graduate could be seen close-up at a stadium with 30 large video boards. “But most of your work is going to be really working closely with companies, or filming events for later webcasts or productions.”

Videos of technical talks and discussions are probably every bit as effective of a marketing tool as are webinars, and a lot easier to produce.

That’s why video is really so prominent at events today. It ensures participating companies that the effort made in presenting at any given event can pay dividends outside of however many potential clients happened to see it at the time.

Videos of technical talks and discussions are probably every bit as effective of a marketing tool as are webinars, and a lot easier to produce. They are a common substitute for white papers in the technological fields and work well with Customer Relations Management databases in the same fashion – gaining company information, email addresses and phone numbers in exchange for web access.

With YouTube claiming in excess of 1 billion unique visits a month, it’s no wonder that a lot of marketing gurus will tell you that your marketing won’t make a sound unless it’s online video. According to the Online Publishers Association, 80 percent of Internet users recall a singular video from the last month, with 26 percent research information about the subject and 22 percent of them actually visiting the website named.

So of course videotaping any presentation at an event should go without thinking, but an overall approach to video ought to be on everyone’s mind well before the trade show season begins. This will ensure that branding graphics can be coordinated with video, and vice versa.

“People use our graphics quite a bit, but usually they are involved in a video production,” Trigg said. “For Hach Co. (a Loveland-based environmental monitoring technology company), we just finished up an image for them that they used for a backdrop – a bird’s-eye view of a landscape demonstrating all the environments their products are used in.”

Catering trends range from healthy to downright decadent

By Beth Potter

Gluten-free desserts and breads? Check.

Special menus available for people with food allergies? Check.

More fruits and veggies and other healthy items on catering menus? Check.

Food trends seem to be on a fast rotation cycle on the menus of caterers in the northern Front Range and Wyoming these days.

For instance, gluten-free menus were an emerging trend just a year or two ago; clients now expect them, Front Range food planners say. Chefs are careful to point to both gluten-free menus and gluten-free options for popular dishes, depending on client needs.

Food-allergy requests used to be more uncommon, but now most catering companies offer fresh, made-from-scratch recipes to avoid them, food planners say. For example, A Spice of Life Catering in Boulder takes pride in making sure there's no cornstarch, peanut oil or added sugars in any of its food, said Molly Miracle, marketing coordinator.

Finally, many clients now request more healthy sides with their entrees, from roasted or sautéed seasonal vegetables to fresh fruit platters to go along with them.

Also on the "trend" list:

Anything "mini" or bite-sized is always popular at events, whether it's a passed appetizer or laid out in platters on presentation tables, caterers say. Spanish-style tapas dishes – or "small plates," as they're often called – are a big hit with clients holding events at The Ranch Events Complex in Loveland, said catering manager Barb O'Malley-Wikstrom.

So are themed, savory "cones" with fillings, from smoked salmon dip with green peppercorns to hot chicken curry with rice, she said.

On the other hand, many of the fun food trends this year are downright decadent.

Southern barbecue menus remain big for many caterers, and they're usually a lower-priced option for customers. BBQ Pork Sliders are a big appetizer request item at A Spice of Life Catering, for example. And Pioneer Bar-B-Que Catering in Cheyenne has seen a big boom in business lunches in the last year or so, said Diane Harrell, who owns the business with husband Wendell Harrell.

Poutine stations—French Fries dunked in gravy and topped with cheese curds—have a following with some Spice of Life clients, most commonly for wedding events, said Miracle. Mushroom bread pudding is another popular item at weddings, Miracle said.

Specialty cocktails with names tailored to specific events have been a big hit recently at The Ranch, O'Malley-Wikstrom said. For a polo event, she unveiled a Chukker Punch, a Pineapple Polo and a

“These are just fun ways of making the event unique,” O’Malley-Wikstrom said.

Babette’s Feast Catering and Bakery in Fort Collins is known for its cakes, but most cake customers don’t seem to worry too much about gluten-free options, said Rudy Burns, owner with wife Angi Burns.

Customers want vegetarian and vegan options on the catering company’s popular lunch menus, though, and Babette’s is happy to help, Burns said.

Macaroni and cheese “bars,” where people can serve themselves, are popular with A Spice of Life clients, as are charcuterie plates with assorted Italian meats, cheese and olives, Miracle said.

Most of all, clients want to mingle more as they eat, and caterers are happy to accommodate. Caterers now often set up “food stations” at various spots around event dining rooms, rather than going with more traditional buffet tables. With food trucks growing in popularity on the Front Range, caterers can bring in an outside truck if the clients request it, several of them say.

Food-truck and street-food themes often have been hits indoors, too, O’Malley-Wikstrom said, including menu items with names such as street tacos, sliders and ramen noodles in the mix.

Fajita bars with all the fixings remain popular with many customers, Miracle said. The do-it-yourself option allows people to take care of their own dietary restrictions while still enjoying plentiful toppings, including cheese, guacamole, grilled chicken, fresh pico de gallo salsa, black beans and other items.

Pioneer Bar-B-Que has come up with the ultimate portable food choice: pulled pork and mashed potatoes layered in a disposable parfait glass with barbecue sauce drizzled on top, Harrell said.

“It looks a bit like an ice cream sundae from Dairy Queen – with barbecue sauce rather than chocolate sauce on top,” Harrell said, laughing.

The couple created a meal in a disposable plastic parfait cup – known as the Bullriders Bowl – for a Cheyenne Frontier Days event a couple of years ago, and it gained such a following that it stuck, Harrell said. With the slogan “Classy catering. Western hospitality,” Pioneer also offers the ultimate Western comfort food dishes – Frito bowls and chili bowls.

Across the board, catering prices generally are still done per person/plate, although reception appetizers may be priced per piece at 50-hors d’oeuvre increments. Gluten-free and special dietary items for bread and dessert may be $1 to $2 higher per person.

IN-HOUSE MEETING SPACE FOR UP TO 70 GUESTS

How did it go?

Get feedback for better event next time; here's how

By Paula Aven Gladych

Even the most popular or well-attended events can continue to improve over the years, and one of the best ways to do that is to solicit feedback from both event sponsors and participants to see what went well and what went wrong.

Darren Rudloff, chief executive at Visit Cheyenne, encourages event and meeting planners to always survey attendees.

He points out that some events are easier to survey than others. Events that have a registration desk or other "pinch point" allow organizers to ask quick questions about where people are from and how they heard about the event. These types of questions allow organizers to find out if their outside marketing is working and which forms of it work best for their audience.

"That gives you an indication of what method you are using is the most effective or maybe you might find sources promoting you that you didn't work on," Rudloff said. "That is an important question to ask that gives you feedback on your efforts. It will help you plan next year's event."

Many organizations send email surveys to participants after the event is completed, asking about the event itself – what they liked and didn't like and what could be done to improve the event.

"We are trying to attract outside visitors, not a local audience," Rudloff said. He likes to ask attendees what their ZIP code is. It is an easy way to see where people are from. Sometimes, organizers go through parking lots to see which states and counties are represented.

While getting feedback from participants, it is always good to ask for a mailing address or email. This helps with future marketing of events, he said.

"We encourage people to try different ways," he said.

Brian Eyster,

vice president of communications for Planet Bluegrass in Lyons, said his organization approaches feedback differently.

"We view ourselves as stewards of these events," he said. "We are always listening through our online forum and social media. We are all directly hands-on, talking to our Festivarians through those channels throughout the year."

Planet Bluegrass also conducts online surveys after the festival. If people fill out the survey, they are entered into a drawing for a pair of tickets to the next year's festival, Eyster said.

"It is important to us every year," he said, "addressing things and making the experience better every single year."

Cliff Bosley, race director of the Bolder Boulder, said his organization uses a formal "Hey Cliff" comment card with five boxes: I'm impressed, I was pleasantly surprised, I was a bit annoyed, I was mad as hell, and here's why.

"We are interested in the good but more in the good, bad and ugly," Bosley said. "We spend a lot of time understanding the feedback we get. Social platforms can also be a really good way to hear what people think and a good way to assess the conversation."

Cheyenne Frontier Days organizers are big believers in surveys. They survey ticket holders. They conduct surveys for economic impact of their event and survey sponsors.

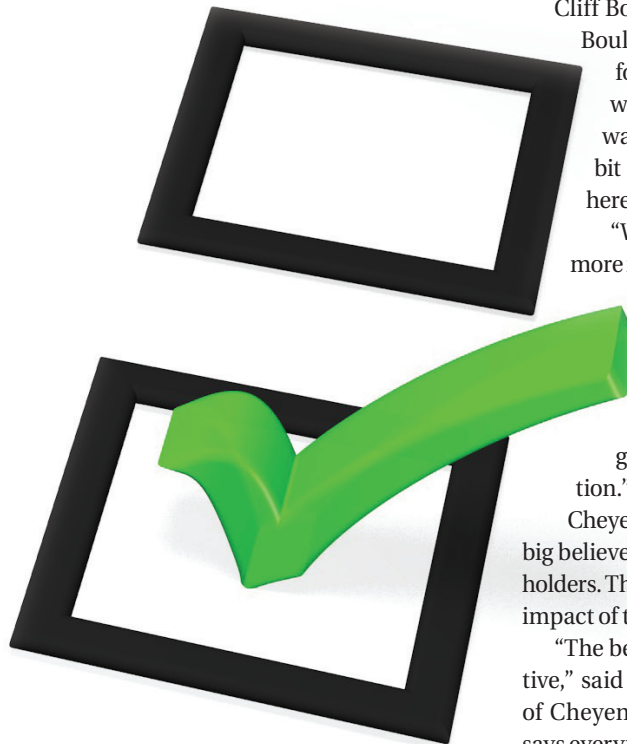

"The best feedback you can get is negative," said Tom Hirsig, CEO and president of Cheyenne Frontier Days. "If everyone says everything is great, that is not true. We tell our sponsors we can't be a better event unless we know something is wrong. The constructive criticism is always better than 'we love the event.' That's great. That's fine, but it doesn't move us forward."

If attendance is down at Cheyenne Frontier Days' evening events, he said, the survey could ask, "Which music genres do you want to see or would you like to hear?"

"Target those areas with questions. Break down your event," he said. "You have to target. You don't want to just flood them with that."

He added that event organizers can't be afraid of the answers, either.

"If you know you've got problems, you still have to ask the questions," Hirsig said. "That's the only way you'll fix them."

Getting the word out

Research, content called keys to promoting an event

By Paula Aven Gladych

Event planning can be a challenging business, and knowing how best to promote your event can be confusing. Established events have an easier time of it. They already have a good reputation in place, so word of mouth figures more prominently in their event promotion. But what should planners of new events do to get noticed?

Tom Hirsig, chief executive and president of Cheyenne Frontier Days, said event planners working on a new event need to take a step back and do their research before they decide how they want to market it.

The key is to understand who your target customers are and what they want, Hirsig said.

“The mistake a lot of people make is they believe they know exactly what people want to hear, see, taste and smell, but they may not know. That’s personal opinion. Until you talk to your target audience and find out for sure what they want, you will throw a wad of money away chasing something that may or may not be true,” he said.

“The research phase is important. Promotion is promotion: advertising, public relations and getting the word out there. But forming a product and having a product people actually want is the most important step.”

Darren Rudloff, CEO of Visit Cheyenne, said his organization works closely with event planners who want to hold conventions and events in Laramie County. It offers workshops to help train people on how to market their events, encouraging them to use the same tricks and tools Visit Cheyenne uses to promote its events.

“We encourage people to use an entire array of promotional techniques,” he said. “Whenever you survey your event attendees, it’s always shocking how people find their information in various ways.”

Everybody believes the Internet and social media are the best ways to promote events these days, but Rudloff is still a big fan of press releases, public service announcements, posters and flyers.

“If your audience is senior citizens, using ads on youthful websites or social media sites may not be appropriate,” he said. “We recommend people use all different methods as long as they make sense in reaching your target market.”

Direct mail and emails are a great way to target the groups of people you want to attract to an event, he said. Keep lists of your own or ask other organizations with like-minded purposes if you can send out to their lists as well.

“You don’t need to do radio advertising, TV or social media. (Those hit) people in a shotgun-blast manner,” he said. “But if you have a good email or mailing list, that’s a rifle shot directly at the consumer. That’s who you want to attend.”

Social media is an important component. Sending out a tailored message to an event’s Facebook, Twitter or Instagram followers is a great way to reach a target audience. Rudloff also recommended finding influencers on these mediums to help promote an event; people who are well connected in the community.

Organizations should try to partner with other organizations that put on similar events in the region, especially if their events are held at different times. Both groups could share mailing lists and advertise at each other’s events.

Cliff Bosley, race director for the Bolder Boulder, said his organization is lucky when it comes to promoting its events.

“Over the years, as the event has grown, we built and maintained a pretty good database of participants and previous participants,” he said. It continues to work because the “event is executed pretty well. It has a good reputation, so we get a lot of good word of mouth because of it.”

The race organizers connect with their Bolder Boulder fan base using Instagram, Twitter and Facebook. “This is a good, efficient way and purposeful way to stay connected to people who are excited about what we do,” he said.

Planet Bluegrass, based in Lyons, organizes the Telluride Bluegrass Festival, RockyGrass and Rocky Mountain Folks Festival.

“We encourage people to use an entire array of promotional techniques. Whenever you survey your event attendees, it’s always shocking how people find their information in various ways.”

Darren Rudloff, CEO of Visit Cheyenne

Word of mouth has been its best tool for the larger events it plans, but the organization also hosts smaller music shows in its 300-seat venue in Lyons.

“From the marketing side, word of mouth is important to us. It is about experiences and the community and people coming back year after year, coming back with friends, neighbors and new members of their family that they want to share this with,” said Brian Eyster, vice president for communications for Planet Bluegrass.

Planet Bluegrass’ Facebook page is its main source of communication with what Eyster calls the company’s Festivarians, people who attend Planet Bluegrass events.

Rather than water down its message with multiple social-media channels, Planet Bluegrass focuses strictly on Facebook and sending out informational email blasts to people who have asked to receive news about the latest Planet Bluegrass events.

“That works really well for our demographic,” Eyster said.

The eBlast is sent out every month and is “very conversational in tone. We are different than other music-type events. It conveys who we are and resonates where we want to be,” he added.

Both of these promotional vehicles help Planet Bluegrass spread the word about its events. “We try to make word of mouth as easy for them to share as possible,” he said.

It is a little more difficult to promote its smaller events. “Lyons is off the path for folks on the Front Range, so we have challenges in getting people here,” Eyster said. “We succeed best when we take the favorite parts of a festival (to promote), the music and community that resonates, bonfires at events and encouraging people to picnic at events. It is a real challenge in terms of selling tickets for those.”

It always comes down to word of mouth. “People are talking about our events all across the country, including the artists,” said Steve Szymanski, senior vice president at Planet Bluegrass. “When they are excited about how cool our events are and telling people, all of a sudden we are getting calls from people who want to play.”

Verticality and intriguing shapes give banners a commanding presence — thanks to new materials and lightweight, multi-piece stands.

By Jeff Thomas

With lightweight, versatile and lower-cost materials now available for event and trade-show banners, printers have a new resounding slogan, harkening back to an old spaghetti Western:

Hang ‘em high.

“The prices have dropped a lot on the fabric (signage solutions); they are lightweight and easy to ship,” said Kristina Rose, sales manager for the GrafXGroup of Boulder. “One of my favorite things is height. There’s a lot of hanging banners at shows now, and it’s a way to truly set yourself apart.”

For indoor displays, the weight and printing versatility of fabric solutions can have a huge advantage over displays of the past. Commonly made from polyester, nylon, satin and other synthetic fibers, fabric solutions employ a high-definition printing method – dye sublimation – that can lead to many more content alternatives and set themselves apart from vinyl solutions of the past.

“Typically with the old trade-show booths you would make it pretty generic, but with prices coming down, companies are able to (highlight) their products more readily,” said Dawn Spiker, production manager for AlphaGraphics of Northern Colorado in Loveland.

Both Spiker and Rose agreed that the high-definition printing is yielding itself to more spot advertising concepts, as opposed to corporate logos and the like – for instance, a shot of a snowboarder in the fresh instead of a picture of your snowboard with your logo.

“Basically, they are competing for your eye attention – getting someone’s attention from across the room,” Rose said. “That’s really what you want at a trade show, once they are at your booth it’s the responsibility of your people to snag them.”

Prices for 100-square-foot fabric displays have dropped to about $1,200, but they also have brought about some other lightweight trade-show solutions, ultra-lightweight retractable banner stands.

“They can be printed anywhere, typically from 24 inches to 48 inches (wide), and five to eight feet high, and have a three- or four-piece stand,” said Striker about the side stands. Not only do these stands have a commanding vertical presence, but they can also be shaped to create even more aesthetic captivation, such as creating rolls or diamond shapes.

Similarly, it now is easier to create curved backdrops for booths because of the light weight of the fabrics used.

“Fabric is the up-and-coming material in the trade-show world,” Striker said. “Besides just being easier to carry and ship, fabric makes it much more easy to set up a space, compared to doing graphic panels.”

Graphic panels of the past often came on trussed supports, and each part of the graphic panel had to fit exactly with adjoining pieces, making for heavy, labor-intensive and fairly expensive solutions, she said.

Companies appear to be getting away from such elaborate booths, and some of the fabric solutions can approach the 3-D impact of the older booth solutions, as well. Fabric is more easily curved and lighter, making for much more simple solutions that still employ three dimensions.

Another evolving solution that is still based on vinyl is light boxes – although in this case it's a translucent vinyl. These LED-based boxes have become fairly inexpensive recently – as little as $250 for a 24-by-36-inch frame.

"The lights illuminate the imagery on the translucent vinyl, essentially elevating the impact," Striker said.

But whatever the solution, the printers noted that sound messaging, graphics and event sophistication are fundamental to success.

"A lot of people just don't understand how to set up with large-format files (needed for printing) and what a difference that makes," Rose said. So long before your display is due at the printer, a graphic artist familiar with that large-scale format should be working with your advertising and marketing team.

At the GraphXGroup, converting a basic layout to a large-format printing file will cost about $80 to $120 an hour. In addition, Rose said, she is willing to recommend several other artists who are capable of converting a good idea to a large-format file.

Still, planning well ahead of the trade show curve, and getting ideas an image files ready, always makes for a better finished product.

"I've been doing this for more than 30 years, so I've been around the block a few times," Rose said. "People still do a lot of things wrong. For once, they tend to put too much information on their backdrop – it's not a brochure, it's there to attract attention."

Another thing not to forget: Whether it's a table-top or large-booth, sign up early and pick a good spot.

"The booth location is critical. If you are way in the back, people are going to be tired by the time they find you," she said. "If you are close to the (front) door or near the food it's a lot easier to get people to hang around."

For the best results, companies must understand how to provide the right type of files for large-format printing.

Conventional APPS

Mobile devices' use at events still seeking widespread use

By Jeff Thomas

Mobile apps are making inroads in conference and other event planning, but not always in the ways that technologists imagined.

"I think the days of 'Please put your phones away and listen' are gone, for sure," said Erik Barstow, director of sales for Visit Fort Collins. However, he added, mobile apps for conferences and industry trade shows often are used most just for getting around and finding information on the fly.

"They are going to show you anything from your own personal schedule to map functions if you are in a city you are not familiar with," Barstow said. "They will save you a lot of time. They'll have diagrams for getting around the conference itself.

"Essentially they will replace that printed map you have to carry around."

Mobile apps for conferences have been getting some serious interest in the tech press. Essentially, they promise to allow attendees to find the most pertinent sessions or session segments, adjust their own schedules, see last-minute changes and interact with speakers, all the while tracking that information for use by the conference team. In some fashion, they don't replace but enhance the on-site signage and maps, both helping and tracking conference attendees to make quick decisions on the conference grounds. They also can help attendees interact with the environment outside of the conference confines in a much more direct fashion.

Beyond that, both Barstow and Daniel

Fulton, director of meetings and conventions at Visit Casper, Wyo., said that most of conventions they visit are taking a wait-and-see attitude toward extending mobile apps into such areas as audience participation. That has been a key area that the app developers have been marketing, allowing for convention attendees to participate in talks and discussions in a real-time method.

Of course, there are a lot of different approaches to audience participation, the most technologically evolved of which would stream questions and comments over video screens, allowing the speaker (or assistants) and audience members to view them in real time. Again the more advanced apps would be able to store such comments in a database, giving post-convention marketers some valuable insight into a potential customer's needs.

A less-advanced, but profoundly simple, approach is just to have attendees post their comments and questions on Twitter with an appropriate hashtag. The Twitter feed also could be streamed in real time, although it would be decidedly less useful for post-conference customer-relations management.

Still, the most profound use of the mobile app for conferences appear to be in directing people in and around the conference grounds.

"That's really the only trend I've seen in apps for events and conferences; the custom app for smart events," Fulton said. "People can use it instead of a paper agenda – what's taking place when and where. Maybe post a picture of the room or speaker, that sort of thing."

Of course, these are fairly new areas of technology, where it's been proved again and again that the most disruptive advances seem to come from modifications of the original idea. Barstow said he believes audience participation will come to be more accepted as convention organizers grow more familiar with the concept.

Connecting to the environment outside of the conference groups appears to have a lot of potential, particularly here in the Rockies where "outside" is a key reason to attract conferences.

"I think there's still something there. Speaker presentations are a two-way street," he said. "I think it probably is coinciding with changes in the way we view adult learning. We're getting away from this traditional thing like the college lecture. Technology can certainly help you do that.

"But right now I think most people are waiting to see it work."

Conference organizers are attempting to increase use of the mobile apps in general, according to both Fulton and Barstow. Gamification, where using the app could get attendees points that can be used for free food or attendance, has cropped up here and there.

But connecting to the environment outside of the conference groups appears to have a lot of potential, particularly here in the Rockies where "outside" is a key reason to attract conferences. Tracking the apps outside of conference grounds could give organizers some valuable data in negotiating with partners whose business is substantially increased.

For venue operators, that same information could be used to attract more conferences – especially when the attendees spend substantial amounts of time visiting nearby attractions, such as the Rocky Mountains.

"I feel that regionally the Rocky Mountain region is already garnering more attention nationally than it has in the past," Fulton said. "I sense that it's there when I attend regional events; there are more and more vendors coming in from both coasts."
