Business booming for Ritchie Bros. Auctioneers

Global demand keeps industrial equipment changing ownership

By Luanne Kadlub, news@ncbr.com

A droopy American economy resulting in a slowdown of residential and commercial construction coupled with bursts of building overseas has Ritchie Bros. Auctioneers sitting pretty as it conducts equipment auctions in Colorado and around the world.

Ritchie Bros. is coming off a record-setting $3 billion year in 2007, thanks in part to the healthy global market for equipment, said Kim Schulz, corporate communications manager for the Vancouver, British Columbia-based corporation.

“We have customers bidding live and online from Mexico, Australia, Netherlands and Dubai in particular. They’re looking for equipment and in-state sellers are looking to sell to those people.”

Ritchie Bros., the world’s largest auctioneer of industrial equipment, operates in more than 25 countries with more than 110 locations. In 2007, the company worked with 35,000 truck, equipment and other asset sellers — a record number

“(The price) is determined by the end user, the last person to put his hand in the air.”

— Steve Merich, regional manager

BIG YEAR — The lot at Ritchie Bros. Auctioneers, located off Interstate 25 and Highway 66, sits nearly empty after the March auction. A strong global market for equipment had Ritchie Bros. finish a record-setting $3 billion year in 2007.

— at 183 industrial auctions in 13 countries throughout North America, Europe, the Middle East, Asia and Australia.

The average Ritchie Bros. auction last year attracted about 1,400 bidders who competed for more than 1,400 lots consigned by 191 consignors. The average gross auction proceeds per industrial auction for 2007 was more than $16 million. The company's largest auction took place in February 2007 in Orlando with gross proceeds of $172 million.

Growing business

Steve Merich, regional manager for Colorado, Wyoming and Utah, said that about 40 percent of buyers at the Colorado auctions come from outside of the area and buy up to 70 percent of the auction items, which includes ag machinery, trucks and cars along with construction equipment. Because Colorado is landlocked, he estimates that only 5 percent to 10 percent of the construction equipment is shipped globally, while the remainder is scattered across North America.

Last month, equipment of all types filled 70 acres at Ritchie Bros.' new location off Interstate 25 and south of Colorado Highway 66 in preparation for the March auction. The auction company relocated last year there from its longtime spot alongside U.S. Highway 85 outside of Brighton.

"We are continually growing our business and we ran out of room," Merich said. "We only had 39 acres in Brighton. We bought 150 acres over here and have developed 70. We have a lot of room to grow. We also like the I-25 exposure. It's very important. Our business is word of mouth."

Scrapers bargain-priced

Buyers at the March auction came from all over to inspect and bid on the equipment. High on the list of many were scrapers — those behemoths that smooth dirt fields and rubble-filled lots into proper elevations for development.

Their selling prices, which have declined dramatically, spotlight the building industry's economic woes. "Scrapers are the first point of construction. You break ground with scrapers," Merich explained. "All of the national housing developers aren't doing much of anything. They've stopped production. Without scrapers working, you don't have the big pipeline contractors doing infrastructure." And so on down the line.

As a result, Merich said, "We saw a fair amount of downsizing (in the construction industry) last year and we're starting to see it again. The housing market has impacted a lot of people around here. We're seeing a downsizing of larger companies and liquidation of smaller companies and a few bank repossessions.

"There's optimism with spring, and jobs are coming up for construction contractors, but they're not forecasting a whole lot of work much past June. Certain companies have landed bigger jobs and are sitting fine for the year; a fair share are wondering where they're going to find work."

This is not what newer companies are used to, he added.

"We've just finished one of the longest upward cycles in the industry — a seven-year run when prices were good. We're starting to see the downside of those robust years. Where it goes from here, there's a lot of speculation."

Putting buyers, sellers together

Though downsizing and liquidation tells part of the story

ERIC NEWMAN, NORTHERN COLORADO BUSINESS REPORT

TEST DRIVE — A mini-excavator gets a closer look on the Ritchie Bros. lot. Last year, the average Ritchie auction drew about 1,400 bidders.

for Ritchie Bros., by no means is it the full story.

"If you're in the market (for heavy equipment), it's a great time to buy, a good time to sell," Merich said.

"Our business is nothing but putting buyers and sellers together. We sell in an unreserved setting, no floor or minimum. An equipment owner can't set the price, it's determined by the end user, the last person to put his hand in the air."

What the price ends up being sometimes surprises even Merich.

"All it takes are two people to fight over something. In Los Angeles, an excavator worth $15,000 brought $50,000," he marveled. "You never know where this pops up from: maybe demand, maybe vengeance from a competitor."

CSU Construction Management students graduate with jobs

Slowdown in industry not reducing company hires from program

By Paige Ingram, news@ncbr.com

FORT COLLINS — The declining economy and housing market has led to some alterations at Colorado State University's construction management program, but no less demand for graduates or supply of new students.

The program, which has provided an interdisciplinary construction degree in business, engineering and the humanities to more than 4,000 students since its inception in 1946, has almost reached its maximum capacity, said Anna Fontana, coordinator of the school's placement office.

"It's the biggest construction management program in the nation right now, with around 1,000 students," she said.

Just 10 years ago that number was at 400. The goal over the next few years is to get enrollment back down to around 800, a number that will still allow the program to maintain the title as the largest. This decrease will be achieved by instituting an admissions cap, accepting only 100 new students a semester, Fontana said.

However, the decrease is not for lack of interested employers. At a career fair in late February, 94 companies came to recruit, with 10 more on the waiting list. Not only were they looking for potential employees after graduation, some were also in search of full-time interns.

All undergraduate CM majors are required to complete both a 12-week full-time summer internship and 500 hours

CHECKING THE SCHEDULE — Construction management intern Kristi Grosse talks with construction management alum Kevin Jones about the schedule of the 2003 renovation of Colorado State University's Guggenheim Hall. of work experience to earn their degree. Students may take a semester off from coursework to complete an optional 24-week internship.

In 2007, 150 companies large and small, local and national, sponsored internships for CM juniors, ranging from Advanced Tank to Xcel Energy. Although the internships are required, students must compete for them. The program guarantees companies at least six students to interview for each position offered.

100 percent placement

While Fontana acknowledged the decline in the construction industry as a concern, she said the program still scores 100 percent placement of graduates. The only difference in employer interest is the number of graduates they are seeking out, she said.

“There’s still a lot of companies coming, but instead of hiring three or four, now they’re hiring one or two,” she said.

Part of the draw is the reputation of CSU’s program, Fontana said.

“With the commercial doing so well our program has become more well known,” she said. “There’s a lot of industry involvement (with our

ONE MORE LOOK — Colorado State University construction management students and instructors take a look at plans. CM graduates are still in demand despite a decline in the construction industry.

How to build a reputation

The Colorado State University real estate and construction management team placed fifth in an undergraduate residential development competition at the International Builder Show held in Orlando this year. This is the second year that a CSU team has placed in the top five.

Thirty schools from across the country entered the competition, which is designed to give students the hands-on experience of creating a residential development. Students developed cash-flow projections, sales and marketing strategies, building estimates and a market feasibility analysis.

The CSU team took a creative approach to their project, suggesting construction should start in 2010 instead of 2008 during a down market — an innovative tactic that earned the team valuable points.

The team included Craig Lessard, Robert Bratley and Lauren Bleck from the real estate program in the College of Business and Zach Baxter, Alex Beckman and Robbie Wood from the construction management program in the College of Applied Human Sciences. Faculty sponsors are Steve Laposa in the College of Business and Brad Johnson in the College of Applied Human Sciences.

program) that has built up a lot of face-time with the industry.”

The kinds of jobs students are gravitating toward have also changed recently.

“It used to be mostly commercial. A lot of students want to do residential but it’s harder to do that lately,” Fontana said. “Industrial and civil is really kicking right now so we’re seeing a lot of interest in that.”

The specific jobs students are interested in these days are project engineer and estimator, she said, with almost 70 percent of current undergraduate students heading toward that goal.

The department also offers a graduate degree and a professional studies program with classes in both Fort Collins and Denver. This spring, the 12-week non-credit professional education program on the Fort Collins campus results in a Certificate in Green Building, taught through the Institute for the Built Environment. It is geared for design professionals, contractors and builders, facility managers, building officials and owners.

And, like many people who watch the construction industry, Fontana said she is optimistic the current economy will turn upward in a matter of time, and the hundreds of students flocking to Fort Collins every year for the program will find the degree worth their time.

Studio H:T thinks outside the boxcar

Boulder firm creates sustainable homes with different designs

By Jules Marie, news@ncbr.com

BOULDER — Brad Tomecek and Christopher Herr built their architecture and design business the way they design homes and buildings: intentionally, consciously and organically. They combined their love of music, architecture and design and opened Studio H:T in 2003.

Their decision to design sustainable homes and buildings was grounded in a conscious choice to be responsible architects and minimize the impact their designs would have on the environment.

“This is what we founded the firm on. It was ideologically driven, sustainable and enriching,” Tomecek said.

They financed the startup with sweat equity and initially accepted small projects. Two years later, the Box House that H:T designed for Herr was featured on HGTV’s Dream House Series. The Rocky Mountain News ran a weekly feature article prior to each episode, enhancing the studio’s credibility.

The Box House cost $350,000 to build, using energy-efficient materials, including a structurally insulated panel system, concrete floors that use radiant heating and low-tech shading devices called shade sails, which promote natural cooling. It won an honor award from the American Institute of Architects.

“We design with intent, not by accident. Our projects are strongly based in concepts and ideas, and they capture the essence of what we believe in,” Herr said.

H:T prefers experimental rather than standard designs, and the architects enjoy working with clients who dream creatively.

“A big part of our studio work is innovation through research. We ask, ask and ask again. We question the obvious,” Tomecek said. “We free our minds of what we’re accustomed to, and we do it differently.”

It’s working. The company is currently enjoying a 25 percent growth rate. Its design costs reflect 1 percent to 1.5 percent of a finished project, because the company believes skimping on design costs reduces the value of the project.

LEED innovation

Studio H:T has designed the first LEED-certified, factory-built modular home in the nation — the 32nd Street Modular — for Tomecek and his family. They combined factory specifications from a modular designer with their own provocative design to construct a unique home. It encourages the concept of urban infill by building on an underutilized lot.

COURTESY STUDIO H:T INC.

OUTSIDE THE BOX — Studio H:T’s award-winning Box House incorporates energy-efficient materials, including a structurally insulated panel system, concrete floors that use radiant heating and shade sails, low-tech shading devices that promote natural cooling.

Herr said he was influenced and inspired by various people, including R. Buckminster Fuller, a philosopher, inventor, architect and cosmologist who once said, “Man knows so much and does so little.”

Studio H:T entered a competition to design a kiosk for waste containers for the city of Denver. Although its design didn’t win, the firm did receive special recognition for designing a mechanized underground system based on the concept of peristalsis: Anything dropped into the waste containers would be grabbed by an electromagnetic force that separates recyclables from compostable items en route to the waste management facility.

“For us, it became more important to think about the larger scale and the real issues versus decorating a can,” Herr said.

Another noteworthy project is the company’s Shipping Container House in Nederland, the home of general contractor Andrew McMullin.

Due to the U.S. trade deficit, it’s more costly to ship empty containers back than to create new ones overseas. As a result, shipping container graveyards exist in the nation’s port cities.

H:T collaborated with McMullin to create the residence out of recycled containers made from steel with teak flooring. These containers can be insulated on the outside yielding 30 percent more insulation than the building code requires.

McMullin uses a wood stove as his primary heat source, along with radiant heat flooring, photovoltaic panels and green roofs. McMullin is working with an energy modeler to design the concrete slab so that it absorbs heat during the day and reradiates the heat at night.

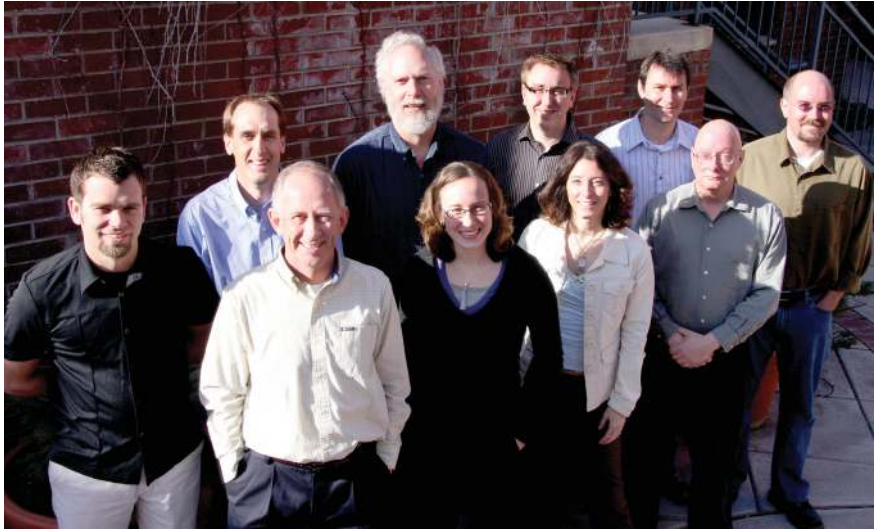

RB+B LEEDs the way in sustainable design

Established firm embraces practices for better buildings

By Marc Rikmenspoel, news@ncbr.com

If you live in Northern Colorado, it's likely that, on a daily basis, you drive past or go into a building designed by the architects at RB+B Architects Inc. in Fort Collins. Some of the firm's notable projects include churches, office buildings, hospitals and medical facilities, the Northern Colorado Water Conservancy District headquarters in Berthoud, two high schools in Greeley and three in Fort Collins, including Fossil Ridge High School, which earned a silver LEED certification from the U.S. Green Building Council in 2005.

The number of projects that bear the RB+B stamp is not surprising, considering that the firm and its predecessors have been in business for over 50 years. The late Bill Robb opened the firm in 1953 as a solo practice, and later became Robb and Brenner Architects and Planners when architect Bill Brenner, now retired, joined the firm. The name became Robb, Brenner, and Breilig Architects, and eventually shortened to RB+B Architects

The firm is now the largest in Northern Colorado, with a team of 23, including the three principles and 12 AIA-licensed architects. The company, which has a presence stretching from Douglas County to Casper, Wyo., has won numerous awards for its designs, in particular for the way these projects have followed through on the company philosophy of sustainable design.

RB+B took a more serious, proactive role in green/sustainable architecture about the time it started designing Zach Elementary School for the Poudre School District in the late 1990s. As LEED — Leadership in Energy and Environmental Design — building practices came to the forefront, staff members began the process of studying and taking the examination to become LEED Accredited Professionals. Eleven have earned the designation.

Fossil Ridge High School was the firm's first LEED project completed in 2004, the same year the American Institute of Architects awarded RB+B its Colorado Firm of the Year. Since then, the majority of RB+B's projects have been designed to be "high-performance," sustainable facilities.

Commercial and sustainable

RB+B is not involved in residential construction, focusing instead on designing for commercial projects. As for staying busy, "We have not really seen much of a slowdown in commercial work, but expect a slight dip in the next year," said Senior Associate Corky Bradley, AIA, LEED AP. "Generally speaking, I think Colorado has a fairly strong construction economy."

The company had 46 projects make it from the preliminary design stage through construction administration during 2007, and most had at least a tinge of "green."

"Green architecture is becoming a worldwide movement," Bradley said.

He added that LEED and green architecture in general is Helping You Do What You Do Best - Even Better!

We're a community bank with community people and over 50 years of experience in Northern Colorado.

As a young business person my most influential mentor taught me what to look for in a bank. "Find a banker that can do more than just say yes or no to a loan request" he told me. "Find one that comes out to your place of enterprise, to better understand your business. One that shares his or her intellectual capital with you freely, one that can be a contributor to your success". At Western States Bank I found those type of bankers.

becoming more accepted, to the point that customers seek out RB+B.

“More and more Requests for Qualifications ask the design teams to list their sustainable/green experience, and often ask what percentage of our staff are LEED AP,” he said.

“RB+B Architects has been on the leading edge of this wave since the late 1990s. And, whether or not a client chooses to LEED certify, they all get the benefit of our 'green' experience, especially in energy savings,” Bradley added.

Builders are amenable to LEED standards, in Bradley's view. “More and more contractors are seeing that sustainable projects are the wave of the future — now, actually. The recent LEED project that we bid out ... had strong interest, and good competition from the construction industry. Also, the 'fear factor' of LEED is dropping away; hundreds of construction professionals are getting their LEED accreditation.”

This is partly because the construction industry has found that LEED projects need not be expensive projects. Only a few extra hours of working through the certification process is required of the architects, while for the builders, “the technology (of construction) has become much more mainstream.”

Word of the advantages of green building practices has spread beyond the design and construction industries. Bradley expects this to continue for the foreseeable future, because the public is aware of it and is now demanding it.

Building codes going green

“Developers are realizing that it not only makes sense, it can make them money,” Bradley said. “Cities, states and even the feds are now requiring it on public projects. Codes are incorporating certain aspects of it.”

In fact, the city of San Francisco recently imposed the country's first all-LEED standard building codes for large commercial buildings and residential high-rises, to be phased in over the next four years. According to the San Francisco Chronicle, the measures are projected to increase the overall cost of projects by 5 percent, but local builders are embracing them.

Boston was the first large city to impose environmental standards for private construction, but on April 8, Boulder County adopted BuildSmart energy efficiency standards for new residential construction that go into effect May 1.

Along with the new energy efficiency standards, Boulder builders will have to get all deconstruction work approved and reviewed by a professional to determine what can be recycled, resold or reused as an alternative to sending everything to the landfill — a hallmark of LEED practices.

“Here's the big picture in my opinion,” Bradley said. “Every year in the U.S., we renovate and/or build approximately 10 billion square feet of structures. By the year 2035, we will have built or changed over 70 percent of our built environment. If buildings account for around 70 percent of the electricity used in this country, what better place to make a major impact on our energy/environmental issues?”

“Buildings offer the best, cheapest, least disruptive, and most effective way to save energy and reduce our carbon footprint. Architects and builders really do have an incredible opportunity at our doorsteps.”

NORTHERN COLORADO ECONOMIC REPORT

The quarterly Northern Colorado Economic Report contains integrated economic intelligence available nowhere else in the region. Local experts gather deep data from diverse sources, then provide exclusive analysis for business decision makers. Especially in uncertain times, it should be required reading for anyone interested in the economic health of Larimer and Weld counties.

The Northern Colorado Economic Report is published by Northern Colorado Business Report Inc. as an expansion of the newspaper's in-depth coverage of the regional economy. It is produced in cooperation with Colorado State University, Northern Colorado Economic Development Corp., the University of Northern Colorado and Upstate Colorado Economic Development.

Content, coordinated by NCBR regional economist Dr. John Green, includes contributions from CSU regional economist Dr. Martin Shields and UNC regional economist Rhonda Corman.

The quarterly Report also presents the Northern Colorado Index of Leading Economic Indicators, featuring a variety of economic data sets indexed by Green, and the Colorado Index of Leading Economic Indicators, in partnership with e-forecasting.com.
