Blueprints changes format to meet changing times

A letter from Publisher Jeff Nuttall

Welcome to the Northern Colorado Business Report's annual Blueprints directory. Focused on the construction and remodeling industry, Blueprints strives to bring together information and relevant data about the businesses that make up the sector, which has traditionally been one of the most important drivers of the region's economy.

Regular readers of the Business Report, especially the quarterly economic index compiled by regional economist John Green, are well aware of the tough times that have hit the industry in the wake of the housing collapse and crisis in the credit markets. In response to the softening conditions in the construction industry, we at NCBR decided to revamp the look and feel of Blueprints this year.

By adopting the tabloid newsprint format, we can present the same number of industry-focused feature stories and ranked lists as last year in a more cost-efficient manner.

Regular readers may also notice that the number of businesses listed in this year's Blueprints has also shrunk considerably. Part of the reason for the decrease lies in the aforementioned economic downturn and its effect on the number of companies currently operating in Northern Colorado. Another part of the reason is that, to keep the new format cost-effective, we have eliminated a great number of duplicate listings from previous years.

If you feel your company should have been listed in Blueprints, please use the form on page 39 to let us know. You may also e-mail our Chief Researcher Karen Allen at kallen@ncbr.com, or call our research department at 970-221-5400, ext. 227, for a survey form. You can also upload your company data online at www.ncbr.com; just click on submit data at the top of the homepage.

I'd like to take this opportunity to express my personal thanks and admiration to those companies, big and small, that have persevered through the current recession and continue to contribute to the local economy.

Northern Colorado is in better shape than many other areas of the country right now, and it is due to the efforts of business people of vision who are hanging on in industries all across the spectrum.

I look forward to continuing to do business with you all in the coming year, and in more prosperous times ahead.

Everything old is new again

Ancient art of timber framing growing as 'green' construction technique

By Jessica Centers, news@ncbr.com

Long before the modern age of mass-produced stick frame homes held together by studs and bolts and nails, there was timber framing. This ancient form of construction involved wood timbers eight to 12 feet long connected by joinery. The structures lasted hundreds of years, instead of the 60-year life most houses built today get before their materials start to deteriorate and expand.

It's no wonder then that a growing number of consumers hungry for sustainability and quality are looking to this old-fashioned craft, with the help of two Northern Colorado builders: Trail Ridge Timber Frames in Masonville and Frameworks Timber in Fort Collins. Both have been capitalizing on the popularity of the "green movement," simply by promoting the sustainable work they'd already been doing for years.

Trail Ridge owners Mark and Kathy Miller started building timber frames about 12 years ago. The craft had slowly been making a comeback in the United States for a couple of decades, "starting with some rich hippies on the East Coast," Mark Miller jokes.

"I've been woodworking since I was a kid. I like big, impressive, inspiring things," he said. "Timber framing had an obvious attraction. I've been in (timber frame) buildings in Europe that are easily 900 years old, some of the oldest buildings in the world ... Timber framing allows you to be creative because it's a structural part of the house that you see. It becomes the most dominant creative element of the house."

Beyond the greater longevity of the buildings themselves, Miller found that timber frames — particularly those he builds today — are also more efficient by design. Most use SIPs or structural insulated panels, which create a solid diaphragm around the house, meaning a better insulated structure with no thermal breaks in the walls.

Recycled 700-year-old timbers

years ago, but wasn't struck by its inherent sustainability until traveling around the United States and Europe as a journeyman. The 700-year-old timber frame buildings he visited in some cases had actually been constructed with recycled timbers. Timber frames not only use less wood than modern stick frame construction, the wood itself is very recyclable.

"If you build a stud-frame house and insulate and pull wires, the amount of material that can be recycled is quite low, the labor content to get it out is high, and whatever is salvaged has very low value," Jones explained. "But timber is easy to recycle and has a high value when it comes out of a building. In the current market, recycled timber is four times as expensive as new timber. Even if a building we build now is taken down in 200 years, the timbers will very likely have a second and third life."

His company, Frameworks Timber, can use local materials including wood coming said. "We need to rededicate the industry to building good buildings."

Miller would agree. He's had homes featured in national magazines — like the retirement house in Estes Park that used Douglas firs burned in fires in Oregon six years ago and then dried out in a big microwave oven in Canada, as well as cherry wood from Pennsylvania bought two years in advance. He also uses a French joinery technique that requires such skill it took him over a year to train each of his three employees.

Thus, for both companies (Frameworks has a carefully trained staff of five) growth is a daunting prospect. "Instead of deciding on a certain amount of growth and then filling the positions, getting the right people on board is what's going to drive our growth," Jones said.

Wider audience

At the same time, both men are excited to see their craft beginning to appeal to a wider, less affluent audience. Most of Frameworks' residential projects are in the $300,000 to $1.5 million range. Trail Ridge has built frames for $30 million homes, but it also works on $250,000 homes and often has projects where timber framing is used in a portion of the house, like the great room, rather than the whole structure: "wherever you most want to see it and can afford it," according to Miller.

"Most green applications are initially supported and endorsed and paid for by the wealthy," Miller explained. "The rich have funded and got the timber frame industry growing but it has great applications for a majority of people."

He recently raised a new shop — with trusses designed after a 17th-century cathedral roof — to be an education center promoting the industry and an example of sustainable building. It has in-floor radiant heating and a roof enclosed with SIPs. Eventually, the goal is to generate zero waste and use solar, wind and their own wood cutoffs to fuel the boiler for the radiant heating.

from beetle-killed pine, which Jones said would be hard to do if he were building stick frame houses. He also buys wind credits for his shop, composts or gives away as firewood all the wood he doesn't use, and is working with geothermal and passive solar systems toward his goal of eventually building houses that can go completely off grid.

"Green is now pop culture and three years ago it wasn't," Jones said. "What we do as a company hasn't changed. We've been smart enough to promote what people are looking for, but we were already doing it. The thing that probably needs talking about more is the relationship of quality building practices to the whole issue of sustainability."

Jones points out that, unfortunately, green does not necessarily translate into quality. "There are some very green companies who are doing quite poor work," he

Do-it-yourselfers keep on doing it

Homeowners tackle minor repair work, large-scale fix-ups

By Kay Rios, news@ncbr.com

Forget the candy and roses routine — give me a power tool as a gift any day.

In recent years, I've become more and more adventurous with the home improvement projects I'm willing to do myself. From creating raised garden beds and forging "breeze" pathways in the yard to replacing light fixtures and fixing leaking plumbing, even building desks and coffee tables, I'm building up my knowledge and abilities. At first, I just wanted to see if I could do it, but now it's become a matter of economics.

And I'm not alone. The do-it-yourself crowd is alive and well in the Fort Collins/Loveland area.

"The do-it-yourself people are a huge part of our customers," said Diane Gregg, assistant manager at the Loveland Habitat for Humanity ReStore. "And it's from remodeling their homes to putting in carpets to crafts."

While she says the ReStore is seeing about the same level of activity as usual, she added, "We expect that to increase with the economic times. The projection is we will have a consistent increase in our customer base."

On the other side of that she believes that donations may be down because remodels may slow. "People are afraid to spend. But as we start to breathe again, people will spend again. Our community is so generous and if they have it available, they will help out."

Joe Kissell, general manager of the Habitat Home Supply Store, Fort Collins, says his store's business also has remained pretty steady.

"Donations are still good and we have good traffic coming through. People are still shopping," he said.

He hasn't witnessed a large increase at this point but he hazards a guess: "I think more people will be looking for things they can buy for less than in the department stores or (big-box stores)."

More fixing, less flipping

The DIY bunch has always made up a good portion part of the store's customer

JUST A LITTLE PROJECT — That's where it starts for most do-it-yourselfers. Then, encouraged by home-improvement projects that look oh-so-easy on the Home & Garden Network, they begin remodeling in earnest, keeping local hardware stores, lumberyards and, increasingly, materials recyclers busy.

base, Kissell said. "We get contractors, landlords and a cross-section of the whole community: lots of students and just ordinary folks. People have always come through looking for bargains so they can do it themselves. Remodels are still strong for do-it-yourselfers."

Kissell sees one area of downturn, however. "The biggest change we've seen is people buying and flipping less."

ReSource Inc. opened up in North Fort Collins three years ago to offer a variety of reclaimed building and landscape materials including doors, cabinets, windows, plumbing supplies, lights, landscape materials and fencing. Clerk Nick Van Hanken says he's definitely seen an increase in DIY purchases lately.

"We've seen an increase from people looking for new items to people thinking about their next project. More are thinking about doing it themselves instead of contracting out," he said.

Van Hanken, who works at ReSource on weekends and is an independent contractor during the week, joined ReSource six months after it opened. "We've gone from seeing 10 people a day to 30 people a day and, every day, it seems like we see more."

He also anticipates more people venturing into DIY. "I believe the next few years will see even more of an increase because we're in such a slow economy. It really helps when you buy at discounted prices."

Tom McClelland, owner of Fort Collins' Downtown Ace Hardware, also said he's seen an increase but adds, "We're geared to the do-it-yourself trade, so we've always seen a steady flow. But now I think we're seeing even more of those people who would have called somebody in the trades to do a repair and are now more inclined to do it themselves: leaking sinks, broken light switches, the toilet that doesn't work right."

McClelland also attributes that to the economy. "We've seen it in past recessions as well."

Do it safely

There are precautions that all DIY-ers should take. "Get direction from someone who knows what they are talking about," McClelland advises. "Most repairs are simpler than people think but they still require some basic knowledge."

Ace has licensed tradespeople such as electricians, plumbers and HVAC technicians on staff, as well as paint experts, he said. "They're great and they're here to help."

But he also added that a lot of resources can also be found online. "Search out your topic and read a variety of sources so you can get several perspectives," he recommends. "And if you're working with something like electrical, research the safety aspects. It's perfectly safe if you know what precautions to take."

Van Hanken also suggests looking into local building codes. "That will tell you what permits you need and what you can do and what you need to hire out."

And for any DIY-er looking for a bargain at any of the thrift and recycle places, Van Hanken said the biggest issue is patience.

"We may have exactly what you need today but then it's not here the next day. Just keep looking and you'll find what you need at a good price if you're patient."

For the love of the art of construction

Justin Larson's passion for architecture helps transcend all challenges

By Anne Cumming Rice, news@ncbr.com

Justin Larson's fifth-grade art teacher was so impressed when Larson figured out how to draw like an architect, he told him, "If you don't go into architecture, I'll break both of your hands."

Larson, the owner of JCL Architecture, Inc., didn't end up with broken hands — not both of them anyway. His road to becoming an architect and owner of his own firm involved being broken and challenged in other ways.

At age 23, his lower right leg was shattered when he was hit by car while riding his bike to school. He had to learn to walk again. At 29, he was in a rollover car accident that caused a severe head injury and crushed all the bones in his left hand, his drawing hand.

"My love for architecture is what helped me survive," said Larson, now 35.

Larson's passion for architecture comes through not only in what he builds, but in how he builds it. He calls architecture the "art of construction," three words that also make up his firm's Web site address (www.theartofconstruction.com).

Larson was a proponent of sustainability — building things in environmentally friendly ways — before the green movement became popular. He's adamant about being available for the contractors he works with, which is why he keeps odd hours, usually working from 4:30 in the morning to 6 or 7 at night.

KRISTA WATZEL, NORTHERN COLORADO BUSINESS REPORT

ARTIST AT WORK — Justin Larson's love of architecture — and the construction techniques needed to bring his artistic visions out of the ground — brought him to Fort Collins, where he founded JCL Architecture, as well as helping him survive two major accidents and find his life's passion.

"I want to be available when the contractors start their day, and contractors like to start early," Larson said.

And people who have worked with him say he shatters the idea that good architecture is something only the rich can afford.

"A lot of people think great architecture costs a lot of money," said Chandler Souther, principal of Windsor-based Hammersmith Structures, which has worked with Larson on a variety of projects. "Great architecture comes from foresight and planning. You don't have to be in the upper crust to afford it."

Laying a foundation

One might say Larson was a workaholic in college. Larson prefers to call it an "abnormal work ethic."

"I worked 50 hours a week plus school-work," he said.

He did a variety of jobs in college, including working at a bottling plant, a frame shop, at a civil engineering firm and as a bartender.

Those jobs, though, were a means to an end. His goal was to become an architect. His designs as an undergraduate at Montana State University helped the institution earn accreditation for a program in which students could earn both a bachelor's and master's degree in five years.

Larson grew up in a Montana town of 3,000 people, where his art teacher was also the wrestling coach at his school. This is the same art teacher who was impressed when Larson figured out how to draw in perspective, a three-dimensional technique that is used for renderings of yet-to-be-constructed buildings. Soon Larson was teaching the entire art class to draw the same way.

He got his first job at age 13 fixing up rental units for an apartment manager. This was his first experience seeing how buildings failed. By then he knew he wanted to go into architecture, and he asked those already in the business what he ought to do to get a jump start.

Some told him, "Don't become an architect. You'll work like crazy, and you won't get paid enough."

Others told him the best training was to gain as much experience as he could in construction.

So Larson learned firsthand about framing, roofing, pouring concrete and other related jobs. He still does construction — he's doing some of the remodeling work on the house he and his wife own.

"I'm one of those people who think architects ought to know how to actually build things," he said.

Souther believes that makes a difference. "Justin is a very hands-on type of guy," he said. "When he designs something for you, it's beneficial because he's been out there and he's done it."

Working through challenges

Larson's first job out of college was working for a firm in Minneapolis that specialized in urban design and construction. For one of his first projects, Larson designed the beams for a building frame, then went to the building site to install them.

He discovered he had made the beams too wide. He had to go back and redesign them. It was another valuable lesson for him in the art of construction.

After several years in the chaotic job in Minneapolis, Larson was ready for a change of pace. Because he had friends in Fort Collins, he moved to Northern Colorado. Arriving in Fort Collins on a Sunday, Larson had five job offers by the next Wednesday. Over the next few years, Larson worked for a couple of local architectural firms that designed commercial projects.

Six years ago, he was back home in Montana for Christmas when his second accident happened, the one that left him with a severe brain injury and a crushed left hand. The brain injury rendered him sleepless for three months — literally — and took away his senses of taste and smell for a year.

He's rare among those who have suffered brain injuries. The only residual effects are vertigo with heights and odd head movements, both of which forced him to give up his hobby of rock climbing. But the accident prepared him for challenges ahead, namely the challenge of owning his own business.

In 2004, Larson started JCL Architecture Inc. — his initials. His first project was a residential one.

"I had never done residential before," he said. "And I had no idea what I was doing."

He soon discovered that his experience in commercial architecture was valuable in residential projects. For instance, Larson regularly designs commercial buildings for a variety of uses. The same concept can be applied to homes, creating spaces that are ideal for entertaining and adaptable to owners' needs as they grow older.

One of Larson's recent residential projects in the foothills west of Loveland earned him the 2008 Architects' Choice Award, given by the Denver chapter of the American Institute of Architects, the Rocky Mountain News and the city and county of Denver.

In 2005-06, Larson did a complete renovation of the interior of Jerry and Kathy McIntosh's 1960s home.

"When Justin came to us, I could see it in his eyes that this was an opportunity for him to use his creativity," Kathy McIntosh said. "But he was very respectful of what we wanted."

What resulted still amazes McIntosh and her husband, particularly the sunroom in the back of the house. The area used to be a brick wall with a small window. Now it's an entire wall of windows that makes McIntosh feel like there's no boundary between inside and outside.

Larson and the McIntoshs forged a friendship through the remodel. Their next-door neighbors have since hired Larson's firm for a remodeling project.

"Even now, if I have a problem with anything, I call Justin, and he responds," McIntosh said. "He feels like this is still his house, his love."

Building a legacy

In five years, JCL Architecture has done several home remodels, the Lofts at Magnolia and the City Centre, both in downtown Fort Collins, and the Old Town Hall restoration in Windsor.

JCL, which offers architectural and planning services, interior design and construction management, opened a second office in Cheyenne in January. The firm has done one-third to one-half of its work in Wyoming, including a business park and hotel in Laramie, an office building in Cheyenne and several upcoming projects at the University of Wyoming.

Still, people thought Larson was crazy to open a new office in the middle of a recession. But Larson often does things like that, said Taylor Meyer, an architect-in-training who has worked for Larson for three and a half years.

"We've always done things as a firm when it felt like it was a little too soon," Meyer said.

Before the economic crisis hit last fall, Meyer said Larson told his employees the firm was going to spend some money on marketing.

"I thought, 'Are you sure?'" Meyer said. "We seem to operate off the theory, 'If you build it, they will come.'"

Larson has built JCL mostly through word of mouth — and taking risks.

"We took a chance opening an office in Cheyenne, but it was an educated risk," Larson said. "If you live in a constant state of fear, you'll come up with all these constraints on what you can do."

The risk has paid off. Larson said the firm is as busy as it's ever been. JCL also gives to the community. The firm is participating in the remodeling of a former retirement home for Crossroads, a safehouse in Fort Collins for women and children who are victims of domestic violence.

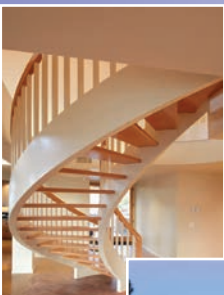

Most of all, Larson, who in his spare time is into motorcycling, mountain biking and running, hopes to build a legacy. He wants that to include a company and projects that live beyond him and transcend the conventional methods of architecture.

"What we're doing won't end with me and won't end in Fort Collins," he said. "We are building a philosophy on how to do architecture."

Larson is already accomplishing one of his three goals in life — to build and run a successful architectural firm. His second goal is to teach. And his third?

"I want to get into movie set design," he said. "Architecture is in everything around us — homes, buildings, cars, movies, story lines. The big question is, 'How do you put all the pieces together?'"

M & E Painting: A Different Kind of Painting Company

When Matt Shoup, founder of M & E Painting, opened the doors for business in 2004, his goal was to make M & E Painting a different kind of company. He wanted to create an organization that his customers and his team members could count on. Matt never imagined M & E Painting would grow to become Northern Colorado's most recognized local residential painter.

Since 2004, M & E Painting has painted for over 1,500 satisfied customers, has grown to over 45 team members, and is currently expanding to new territories in Colorado. M & E Painting prides itself on offering an experience for its customers that is uncommon in the painting and contracting industry. They have one of the best written warranties in the business, and do not take an up front deposit from their customers, choosing instead to be paid when the job is completed. All of their painters are superior craftsmen who thoroughly enjoy what they do. Calls to the office are returned within 24 hours, or by the next business day, and there is a full time office staff to answer customer's calls and questions. They also have a unique referral program which rewards their customers for jobs that they refer to M & E.

The company's structure allows for its customers to receive a superior quality paint job, unbeatable customer service, and allows for all its team members to have promotion and expansion opportunities. "All of our team members are passionate about what they do, and are completely dedicated to our customers, and desire to advance and grow within the company," says Shoup. Some of M & E's key team members started off painting and have worked their way up through the company. "They were able to see how we operate, and have come to appreciate the culture and core values our company has."

"Our team members know they have a future with us. We are always looking to grow and expand; we never want to stay stagnant. Our company culture fosters an entrepreneurial mentality, where one of the highest positions, that of vice president, offers team members the opportunity to open a new division of M & E Painting in another territory," says Shoup. Shoup also explains that the position includes profit sharing and an unlimited career potential. M & E's first VP will be expanding to Denver this January, and there will be two additional expansions in 2010.

After the first five years of business, and looking ahead to the future, Shoup is certain that M & E will continue to grow and prosper. "The superior level of service we offer our customers, along with the experience and skills our team members possess are what make us different. We are all passionate about what we do, and we plan on being around for a very long time."
