A comprehensive directory of general contractors, architects, engineers,
homebuilders and more.

A note to readers from the publisher

Improving, but not yet out of the woods.

That's probably the best way to describe the construction industry at the moment.

The latest figures from F.W. Dodge show that between 2010 and 2011, total construction permits grew 20 percent in Larimer County and 3 percent in Weld county.

Total square feet constructed over the same period was up 16 percent for Larimer, but down 25 percent for Weld. Most notable is the fact that total value increased 27 percent for Larimer from $276 million to $376 million, but fell 107 percent in Weld from $658 million to $318 million.

A mixed bag to be sure, but far more encouraging than numbers from a few, short years ago.

And, all the more reason for the Northern Colorado Business Report to recognize the local companies that continue to persevere in this slow-recovering economy. You will find them here in Blueprints, both on our ranked lists and in the directory at the back of this publication.

Thanks to our Chief Researcher Mariah Gant for her work on this directory. If we have overlooked a company that should be included here, please send her an email (mgant@ncbr.com) with all the information and she will follow up to make sure our database is as accurate and complete as it can be.

Thanks also to all of our Blueprints advertisers, and thanks especially to all our local construction, real estate, engineering and architecture firms that continue to find new ways to keep moving forward as we continue our climb out of the Great Recession.

Oval, open-air, a dome?

Choices are many in stadium design

BY MOLLY ARMBRISTER
marmbrister@ncbr.com

Whether Colorado State University moves forward with a new stadium remains up in the air, but there are a number of new college stadiums across the country that provide some idea of what CSU might build.

Here's a quick look at what other universities with stadium ambitions are planning or have done.

Tulane spending $60 million for new on-campus stadium

The Green Wave of Tulane has played in the Superdome in New Orleans since 1975 and is now planning for an on-campus stadium, to be ready for the 2014 season.

The stadium is expected to cost $60 million – substantially less than the potential cost of an on-campus CSU stadium, which could range anywhere from $100 million to $200 million – and will seat 30,000.

Tulane will build an oval, open-air stadium, designed by architecture firm Gould-Evans Associates. Robert Riccardi of Gould-Evans designed the structure after being commissioned by Tulane Athletic Director Rick Dickson.

The Green Wave's new home will include a plate-glass press box and two patio areas, as well as a game-day pavilion in front of the stadium. Artificial field turf will carpet the playing surface.

It will be located directly in the middle of what Tulane officials call the university's "athletic footprint," a cluster of sports-related buildings on-campus.

BAYLOR UNIVERSITY

The architectural firm working on Baylor's stadium has also been retained by CSU.

Baylor plans to include a bridge between its campus and stadium

Everything's bigger in Texas, including the proposed $250 million stadium for the Baylor University Bears, located in Waco.

This stadium is also in the planning phase, which means many details have not yet been hammered out, but Kansas City-based architecture firm Populous, formerly HOK Sport, the country's largest stadium designer, is on the case.

The 90-acre site on the bank of the Brazos River will provide a scenic setting for the Bears to hit the gridiron, cheered on by some 15,000 current students and thousands more alumni.

Five stadium builders are working on plans for the Baylor stadium, and expect to have them complete in January 2013, with the stadium ready for play in the fall of 2014.

No firm in Waco is large enough to build a stadium, according to the Waco Tribune-Herald, but local companies are likely to be used as subcontractors.

The favorite for general contractor?

Tulsa, Okla.-based Manhattan Construction, with a resume that includes Cowboy Stadium, the world's largest domed stadium with a $1.4 billion price tag, as well as the Pepsi Center in Denver, home to our very own Denver Nuggets and Colorado Avalanche.

Of course, the City of Waco has to approve any and all plans for the stadium.

Although many of the details have yet to be decided, site plans call for a pedestrian bridge across the Brazos River, connecting campus and the stadium.

STADIUMS from 3C

Minnesota puts emphasis on views, fan comfort

The University of Minnesota's TCF Bank Stadium, affectionately called "The Gopher Hole," opened in 2009, three years after breaking ground in September 2006.

The stadium can seat 50,805 Gopher fans and has the capability to expand to an 80,000-seat facility.

The total price clocked in at $288.5 million, after $39.8 million was added to the cost in 2007 to incorporate environmentally friendly elements.

Like the Tulane stadium, TCF Bank Stadium was designed by Populous, who recommended that the stadium be constructed in a "horseshoe" style to support future expansion. The open end of the horseshoe provides those in the stadium with a view of campus as well as downtown Minneapolis.

The design includes a blend of brick, stone and glass that replicated the look and feel of the University of Minnesota campus, and focuses on fan comfort with 19-inch seats and 33 inches between rows.

The bowl of the stadium is referred to as "single rake," without the multiple decks and overhangs typically seen in professional stadiums. The façade on the exterior of the stadium resembles Memorial Stadium, where the Gophers played prior to the opening of TCF Bank Stadium.

UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Built for growth, this stadium can be expanded to accommodate 80,000 fans.

Choose Prosperity.

Remaking the Lory Student Center

The $65M project will add 40,000 sq. ft. and lots of windows

BY RICK RADIN
news@ncbr.com

Colorado State University is planning to renovate its Lory Student Center, a project that's scheduled to begin next year and which will be a showcase to the university's commitment to students in the 21st century.

The refurbished center, expected to be completed in time for the start of the fall semester of 2014, will be designed to meet the needs of a larger, more-diverse student body, said Mike Ellis, the center's executive director.

The new center will have a more open design, incorporating more windows, offering spectacular view of the mountains to the west to the expected 20,000 to 25,000 students a day that will use it.

"There will be more glass and much more openness and connection between the three levels of the building than currently exist," Ellis said.

The renovated center also will contain two art exhibition spaces, the Curfman Gallery, which is in the current building but will be relocated, and the Duhesa Gallery.

Targeted student services, such as the Native American and African American cultural centers, will be placed in one centralized location, instead of spread throughout the building.

The renovation will add 40,000 square feet to the existing center's 310,000 square feet.

There will be a larger food court, with more indoor and outdoor seating, and a refurbished Ramskeller brew pub on the lower level.

A new portion of the building will contain a larger ballroom and additional meeting rooms. The new building will continue to house the headquarters for the associated students, the fraternity and sorority system, and other major campus organizations.

"You (will be able to) do everything from buy lunch, attend a meeting upstairs, work in a quiet study area or have a beer down below," said student body President Eric Berlinberg, a senior business major and a member of the center's master plan committee.

About $60 million of the $65 million budget for the project will be paid out of a 30-year bond issue with the other $5 million from student center reserves and other fundraising, Ellis said.

A $70 per semester student fee increase to pay for the bonds will begin when the building opens in the fall of 2014. CSU students approved the fee increase in April 2011.

"Only the students who are going to be enjoying (the center) are going to be paying for it," Berlinberg said. "I wish that I was going to be a student here when it is done."

Fort Collins-based architects Aller Lingle Massey make up the lead design team with help from Perkins + Will, a national firm that has designed new student centers at Texas A&M University, now under construction, and the University of Washington, Ellis said.

The designers are aiming to achieve "platinum" environmental certification, the highest level, under the Leadership in Energy and Environmental Design rating system developed by the U.S. Green Building Council.

The LEED ratings are based on points credit for water and energy efficiency, use of renewable materials, indoor air quality, innovation in design and other criteria.

Many faculty members are looking forward to the ballroom and food court expansions, which will make the campus more attractive for conferences, said Doug Hoffman, a business school professor on the master plan committee.

"It's a positive for conferences as far as the faculty is concerned, and it helps with your brand image and attracts students," Hoffman said. "It's good all the way around."

The renovation is technically the outside in the cold for the bus," he said. "Now they have an indoor place to wait."

A second phase, the $6 million renovation of the student center theater, is now under way with completion scheduled for June.

The new theater will be larger and more flexible to host a wider variety of concerts and other performances.

Designers based the color scheme on the rock formations at Horsetooth Reservoir west of Fort Collins.

The student center is one of a series of building programs going on now or planned for the near future to answer the growth in the university's student population.

"Right now we're at about 27,000 students," Ellis said. "The president's goal is to be prepared for 35,000 students."

Elsewhere, CSU is renovating and expanding its main library, a project that will be completed right after finals week this spring. The university is also expanding its engineering building and adding fourth floors to its three-story Braiden and Parmelee residence halls.

About 5,000 students live on campus and more than 20,000 live in the communities surrounding the university.

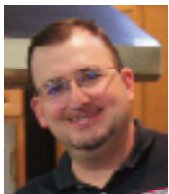

"We have an aging infrastructure and bond rates are so low that it makes sense to do (the upgrades) now," Berlinberg said.

The only downside to all the construction, Hoffman said, is that it can give the public the impression that the university has plenty of money, even though the faculty haven't had raises in three years.

"Higher education is struggling as these buildings are going up," Hoffman said. "But (the faculty realizes) that construction funding and salaries come from separate funding sources."

Restoring its heartbeat

Plenty of work remains but Loveland makes huge strides

BY MAGGIE SHAFER
news@ncbr.com

When Phil Farley pulled up outside the newly remodeled Rialto Theater for a meeting one night in early March, he found himself getting a bit emotional.

Looking up at the three-story building from his parking spot on Fourth Street, Farley could see through the windows that city officials, council members and friends were gathered in the brand-new conference room. They were sipping drinks, talking and laughing in the space they had together created.

"It looked just like the architectural rendering," Farley, the director of community relations for the Loveland Community Foundation, said. "This was so important for the revitalization in the community of Loveland. It was a beautiful sight."

If all goes as hoped, more "beautiful" sights are coming to Loveland, though at the moment, walking through the streets of downtown, it's clear a lot remains to be done.

Rehabbed buildings — like the restored Rialto — sit next to still-sagging storefronts with dated signage and décor.

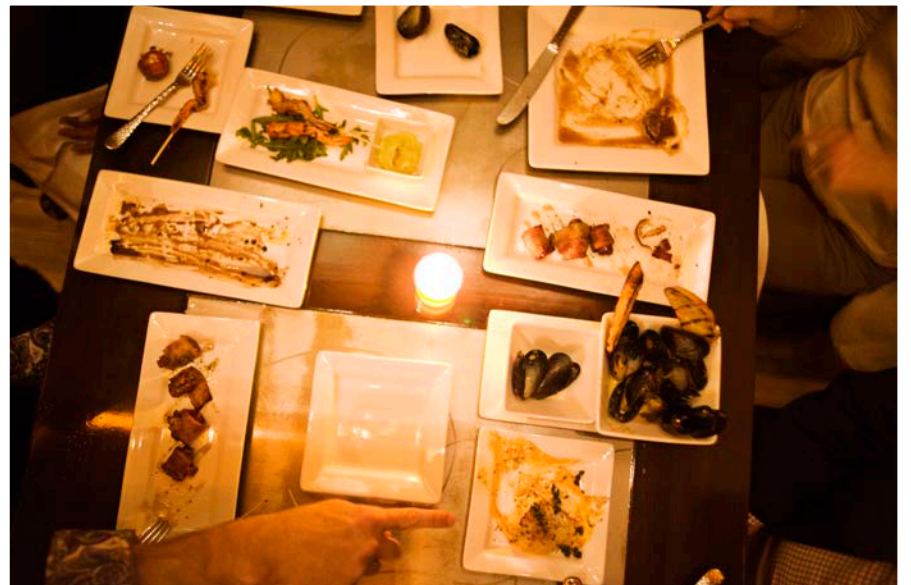

Loveland, however, has been working hard over the past couple of years to move beyond its past and embrace the future.

This heightened commitment to growth and progress is evident in Loveland's public and private sectors alike, showing up in remodels, renovations, restorations and brand-new construction projects scattered throughout the downtown and surrounding areas.

There is no doubt that this city, founded in the 1870s, is heading fully into the 21st century.

Farley has been an active community member since he moved to Loveland to work for Hewlett Packard in 1978. But the Rialto renovation project was a first for Farley, both in magnitude and emotional investment.

It's easy to see why.

Built in 1920, The Rialto has been a community centerpiece for more than 80 years, serving as a theater, a movie house and even a flea market. When the city purchased the building in 1987, it was rededicated as a venue for live performances and movies.

Although the space was well-loved and utilized, the historic building was not without significant limitations. Unequipped for the crowds that modern Loveland brought in, the stage had tiny dressing rooms and no storage areas, and the single bathrooms made for a congested lobby and incredible lines at intermission.

If the building was going to keep up with growth, an expansion was inevitable.

And so began the Rialto Bridge Project. In an equal partnership between the city and a private developer, and with the purchase of two buildings to the west, the building has been expanded to a 20,000-square-foot, three-story, full-fledged performing arts center, complete with a restaurant, offices for rent and a community meeting room.

"The Rialto was a wonderful performing arts center that was historic and had always been very nice," said Loveland Mayor Cecil Guiterrez, "but with all the additions, it's (now) the jewel of downtown. It just needed that sparkle, and now it's really the diamond in the ring."

The "bridge" in the project title is relevant to both the vision for the structure and Loveland itself. Named after the Rialto bridge in Venice, which functioned to bring all different sides of the population together, this architectural aspect to the theater is purely symbolic.

"The idea is to bridge gaps in the community, to be a place where large groups from all over Loveland can be brought together, to encourage dialogue," said Farley. "And that's a real value in our community."

But it's more than that.

Downtown Project Manager and City Planner Mike Scholl said the Rialto underscores Loveland's commitment to making improvements in its core.

"The project shows that we're serious about downtown," he said. "The first projects are the most difficult, and come with the most risk. I think now we're poised to be a big place of growth in the region, both residential and commercial."

Indeed, the Rialto is just one of many investments Loveland has made into its downtown in recent years. A library remodel, expanded city center, posh new apartment buildings, a proposed museum renovation and the revitalization of several business facades are just a few examples of the facelift the city has begun.

The decision to invest tax dollars into the city center was several years in the making. Surveys done by the Downtown Loveland Association all revealed that downtown was an area the majority of residents supported maintaining. A belief so strong, they were willing to spend long-collected tax dollars to ensure its completion.

"The one thing we all share is downtown," Farly said. "Everybody comes to downtown, because they have to. Whether it be for the museum, the Rialto or the government offices, not any other single neighborhood has that mass appeal. It's part of the community that everyone can benefit from the renovation of."

The location to invest in may have been clear, but the timing — smack

JONATHAN CASTNER

Loveland City Council member Phil Farley is also with the Loveland Community Foundation, which was instrumental in helping raise money for the Rialto Theater's renovation. Here, he leads a tour of the just-opened building.

in the middle of one of the worst recessions the country has seen — was slightly less obvious.

Thanks to its Capital Expansion Fees Program, the city has been collecting a few dollars from all new development projects since 1984. Part of the city's "pay as you go" development model, revenue from the CEF was set aside for the proverbial rainy day. With a drop in construction costs and the need for job growth brought on by the recession, that rainy day had arrived.

The Chilson Center renovation and the library expansion were accomplished using CEFs, and about $497,000 was used from the cultural services CEFs to do the Rialto Theater Center.

As with the Rialto project, the public sector doesn't have the resources to renovate other parts of downtown on its own and it will need the help of private investors to keep up the momentum.

Michael and Heidi Thrash are doing their part.

The couple moved from Seattle to Loveland to open a coffee shop in 2006. They were young idealists, in search of a small town and sunshine.

Coffee Tree, the shop they opened inside the Anthology Bookstore, quickly became a Loveland favorite, and it wasn't long before an expansion was necessary. And then it wasn't long before another expansion was necessary.

"Our sales have already grown 30 percent since our second expansion last July," said Michael. "It's ironic because we've had our best growth during the rest of the country's recession."

While its clientele spans the generations, Coffee Tree is a hub to the twentysomethings of Loveland. They are a demographic largely missing from other parts of the city, as the majority of young adults seem to leave Loveland to find opportunity. The mayor believes with continued innovations and business growth, that could change.

The Thrashes have decided to expand once again — with their eye on a storefront just down the street from the Rialto. They may be leaving behind Anthology, but they'll never leave downtown.

"Downtown Loveland is a wonderful place if you can carve out a niche for yourself with quality and community," Heidi said. "The city will absolutely die-hard support you to the end. We see a lot of the same people here every single day."

Mayor Guiterrez, a former educator, knows how important people like the Thrashes are to his city.

"As a teacher I saw smart, intelligent, creative young people that thought that they had to get out of Loveland to pursue a career," he said. "I want Loveland to be that city where young people can see it as a place to grow and thrive and stay and raise their family."

Pulliam Building: poised for a comeback

A makeover aimed at getting the 'most bang for our buck'

BY MOLLY ARMBRISTER
marmbrister@ncbr.com

It's an Art Deco icon, but sagging, weary and in desperate need of a face-lift and a lot more.

This could be the year that the ball finally gets rolling to rehabilitate Loveland's historic Pulliam Building, and everyone behind the project is working hard to get a proposal before the Loveland City Council by fall.

The 20,000-square-foot Pulliam Building was constructed in 1936 as a community center with a $20,000 grant from the Pulliam family of Loveland.

At the time, the building, located at 545 N. Cleveland Ave., included the largest auditorium in Northern Colorado and played host to dances, club meetings and other community purposes, according to a history compiled by Laurie Dunklee, a great-granddaughter of the Pulliams.

Over time, the building has become functionally obsolete, according to Loveland City Planner Mike Scholl, needing air conditioning, upgrades to meet fire codes and accessibility requirements and removing the fixed seating to create a more flexible space.

The projected cost for the project is approximately $3 million, Scholl said, half of which is expected to come from public fundraising.

Scholl's department will need to prepare a request to submit to council, which Scholl expects will happen sometime this fall. City Council made the Pulliam project a priority for 2012, Scholl said.

Any plan presented to council takes careful consideration, Scholl said, because the goal is to get "the most bang for our buck."

The Pulliam has been an iconic building in the community for a long time, Scholl said, and preserving it is something that requires careful planning, especially because some of the money used will likely come from taxpayer dollars.

NORM REHME

Half of the $3 million project is expected to come from public fundraising.

The project received a $14,715 grant from the Colorado Historical Society late last year, for the purpose of funding a structural and engineering assessment of the building.

The assessment was required as a precursor to securing state and federal historic landmark status, as well as to make sure the building was still structurally sound.

Supporters of the project say that, with renovation, the building can once again attract business to the heart of the city.

In addition to bringing visitors and their tax dollars downtown, fixing up the Pulliam Building would also reduce the amount that the city spends maintaining the building, according to the project's website.

The city will spend more than $1.2 million over the next 10 years on the building as it is.

The city's subsidy of the building would no longer be needed if it were to be redone, according to project proponent Norm Rehme. More than 10 community organizations have already expressed interest in using a renovated Pulliam building, the website said.

Even now, without renovation, the space is used frequently by community members. In 2010, the basement of the Pulliam building was used more than 300 times.

The renovations would result in more than 4,500 square feet of open hardwood floor in the auditorium alone, affordable space for nonprofit organizations, occupancy for over 300 people, and an increase in patrons to downtown amenities, including the recently renovated Rialto theater.

Rehme and other Pulliam project supporters have created Center of Loveland Inc., a nonprofit dedicated to fundraising for the renovations.

To date, about $200,000 has been raised, Rehme said, after beginning fundraising about three years ago.

Currently, the city is spending between $100,000 and $120,000 each year on the Pulliam Building, but bringing in only about $10,000 annually, Rehme said. After the renovations, the city would break even on costs related to the building, he said.

A Loveland resident for more than 30 years, Rehme is passionate about the project and restoring the Pulliam Building to its former grandeur.

"Once you delve into it, you see (the Pulliam) has a greater and greater benefit to the community," Rehme said.

Greeley awash in water projects

The aim: protecting supplies for the next few decades

BY PAULA MOORE
news@ncbr.com

Greeley is awash in water projects — from a new pipeline to stormwater construction — designed to make sure the city has the water it needs for decades to come.

The reservoirs and treatment plants that serve the city are currently up to date, according to water authorities, but Greeley is working on developing long-range water supplies.

“We’re working on water supplies for 2050 and 2060 now. ... We’re in an area that’s going to have increasing multiple demands on a finite resource,” said Harold Evans, chairman of the Greeley Water & Sewer Board.

“How we manage that is the challenge — not just for Greeley or Fort Collins, but the state.”

While Greeley isn’t participating in the $500 million Northern Irrigated Supply Project (NISP) water storage effort, the city supports the endeavor because of its importance to the Greeley area’s significant agricultural industry. The project is Northern Colorado’s largest water storage project since the Colorado-Big Thompson Project was finished in 1957.

“If we don’t have storage capacity to get us through drought, the most likely place that water comes from is irrigated agriculture,” Evans said. “The NISP will significantly minimize taking water from agriculture for municipal and industrial use.”

Weld County, including Greeley, has experienced some of the most significant population growth in the state in recent years, and is expected to keep growing, in part because it offers an attractive lifestyle, educational facilities such as the University of Northern Colorado (and close proximity to Colorado State University in Fort Collins), and established agricultural and energy industries. The county is an energy hot bed, of course, with traditional oil and gas companies such as Anadarko Petroleum Corp. as well as cutting-edge clean-tech businesses including Vestas Wind Systems A/S, with its Windsor operations.

Greeley’s population rose nearly 21 percent from 2000 to 2010, to 92,889 people, according to the U.S. Census Bureau. Weld County’s population shot up nearly 40 percent to 252,825 during the same period.

Boosting storage capacity will cost millions of dollars.

“It goes without saying that Weld County is sitting in a sweet spot. ...

“How we manage (water supplies) is the challenge — not just for Greeley or Fort Collins, but the state.”

Harold Evans
CHAIRMAN
GREELEY WATER & SEWER BOARD

The City of Greeley has proved it’s open for business, and is doing what it can to maintain existing businesses and attract new ones,” said Sarah MacQuiddy, president of the Greeley Chamber of Commerce.

Major Greeley, and Northern Colorado, water projects include:

Bellvue Pipeline — The Greeley Water & Sewer Department has been building the pipeline since 2003, and it’s scheduled for completion in 2013. The 30-mile project, consisting of 60-inch pipe and estimated to cost $22 million, will give the city more high-quality drinking water.

The pipeline, which runs from the Bellvue Water Treatment plant northwest of Fort Collins to Greeley, is about three-quarters finished, and that part is already in service. It supplements the city’s three existing, 27-inch pipelines, and is being paid for by city water ratepayers.

Windy Gap Firming Project

— This $270 million venture supplements the Windy Gap water-diversion project, located just west of Granby and completed in 1985. Built by the Northern Colorado Water Conservancy District (Northern Water), the original project diverts Colorado River water and pumps it to Lake Granby. Greeley and several other Northern Colorado cities launched the project in 1967, and benefit from its water.

The project, whose final environmental impact statement was released by the U.S. Bureau of Reclamation in late 2011, involves building the 90,000-acre-foot Chimney Hollow Reservoir southwest of Loveland to increase Windy Gap’s reliability by firming its existing water rights. The reclamation bureau is expected to decide sometime in 2012 if the project will go forward. The effort still needs approvals such as construction and water quality permits before design and construction can start.

Halligan-Seaman Water Management Project

— Greeley and Fort Collins are collaborating on this regional water storage and management effort on the North Fork of the Cache la Poudre River, to boost water storage for the cities. The project will increase capacity at the Greeley-owned Milton Seaman Reservoir to 53,000 acre-feet from 5,000 acre-feet when it’s finished in 2030. The capacity of the Halligan Reservoir, owed by Fort Collins, would grow to 22,500 acre-feet from 6,400 acre-feet; the project is scheduled for completion in 2016.

As of 2011, the cities had spent more than $15 million on environmental impact statements, with a final EIS expected in 2014. Greeley also is working on a $1.6 million upgrade of Seaman reservoir hydraulic and mechanical systems at all five gates that control water levels, which were installed in the 1940s.

Stormwater Projects — Greeley has budgeted $4.2 million in 2012 for stormwater runoff control construction and replacement. That work includes the $1.5 million second phase of construction on the 35th Avenue/Best-Way Regional Detention Pond stormwater capture project. Replacement efforts range from upgrading the Belair Storm Drain to ditch repair.

Northern Irrigated Supply Project

— The NISP is waiting for U.S. Army Corps of Engineers approval of its EIS, which is expected to come this year or in 2013, before it can do anything else. But project developer Northern Water is optimistic the project will get a green light from the Corps. NISP components include the Galeton Reservoir near Greeley, the Glade Reservoir near Fort Collins, two pump plants, water-delivery pipelines and improvements to an existing canal to divert water from the Poudre River. Once the EIS is OK’d, design can continue; construction is estimated to take four to eight years.

“We feel pretty confident the Army will say the project is permissible. ... If you don’t build this, we lose 100 square miles of Colorado farmland,” said Brian Werner, Northern Water spokesman.

The project will provide 40,000 acre-feet of new water supply a year. That water will be used for agricultural as well as municipal use by cities such as Evans, Windsor and Eaton; central Weld County; and the Fort Collins and Loveland water districts. Those participants have already spent roughly $11 million on analysis and planning.

The Greeley Chamber of Commerce supports the NISP because it will help the area agricultural economy, a major economic driver. “What happens to your next door neighbors can directly impact you,” said MacQuiddy.

Architecture firms hiring once more

The number of registered architects on our list has grown substantially since last year, from 48 in 2011 to 61 in 2012, quite a jump considering that the number grew by just one in 2010.

When commercial real estate took a turn for the worse during the recession, architects took a big hit.

Like so many others, the architecture firms in Northern Colorado did some restructuring. Layoffs were part of that and some firms disappeared altogether. But eight of the 12 companies on this year's list were also on the 2011 list, underscoring, if anything, their resiliency.

One notable change is reflected in the merger of two of last year's firms, VFR Design Inc. and JCL Architecture Inc. Last June, the two brought all of their skills under one roof, creating Vaught Frye Larson Architects, No. 4 on this year's list with four registered architects and 12 employees total.

The No. 1 firm on this year's list was The Neenan Company, with 17 architects. It displaced last year's top-ranked firm, RB+B Architects Inc., but is new to the list, it appears, only because Neenan was overlooked in the research for the 2011 list.
