They came, they stayed – so now what?

BY DALLAS HELTZELL dheltzell@bizwest.com

States' social and economic picture could change with aging population

"He was born in the summer of his 27th year, coming home to a place he'd never been before."

John Denver wrote that opening line to his 1972 hit song "Rocky Mountain High" to describe his own feelings about moving to Colorado. But to today's demographers and economic forecasters, the lyric's significance is far more than spiritual.

Lured by visions of an idyllic lifestyle amid spectacular natural beauty celebrated in Denver's music, "those baby boomers relocated here in the 1970s – but as they've aged, many have chosen to age in place," said Cindy DeGroen, projections demographer for the Colorado State Demography Office.

That influx of people born in the post-World War II years created a "demographic dividend" for Colorado, DeGroen said, giving the state a much larger portion of its populace in the prime 16- to 64-year-old labor force – and a higher percentage of those in their peak earning years – than the United States as a whole. And because the boomers raised their families here, Colorado by 2010 was the nation’s fourth-youngest state.

Now that the boomers are reaching retirement age, however, the picture is changing – with huge implications for overall income, housing demand and social services, she said.

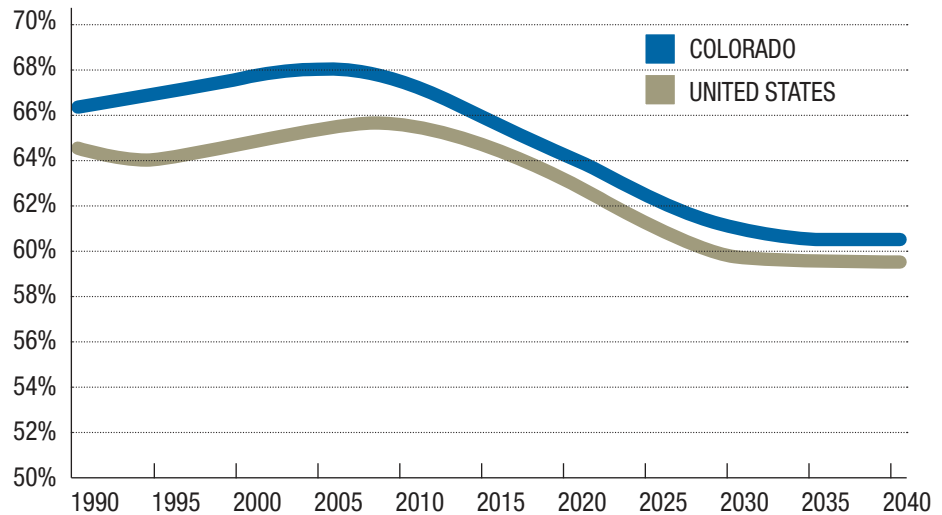

The picture is somewhat different in Wyoming because of the influence of the state’s energy economy, said Wenlin Liu, principal economist at the state Department of Administration and Information’s Economic Analysis Division.

“We got that same influx of baby boomers in the ‘70s,” Liu said, “but when oil prices went bust in the ‘80s, many of the younger workers left.”

They took their birth rate with them, Liu said, leaving the state with a smaller proportion of its population in Generation X – those born between 1965 and 1980.

Share of population ages 16-64

Ageing of the baby boomers will change Colorado’s age distribution rapidly. We’ll look more like the nation by the end of this decade

Source: Colorado State Demography Office

“What that means today is that we don’t have enough workers to replace the boomers as they retire,” Liu said. “We have a labor force shortage. The construction industry is already feeling that, especially in the Casper area.”

Liu estimates that Wyoming’s population of people age 65 and older will nearly double, increasing from 70,090 in 2010 to 137,443 by 2030. Meanwhile, Colorado state demographer Elizabeth Garner projects that Colo-

Longevity

The plan for when retirement funds start running low

BY PAULA AVEN GLADYCH news@bizwest.com

Demand for guaranteed income in retirement has not diminished, even as companies have moved away from traditional pension plans and the fate of Social Security hangs in the balance.

One way people got around that in the past was to buy a traditional life insurance annuity that would kick in when they retired, giving them a small monthly allowance based on their initial investment.

A newer form of annuity, called a deferred income annuity or longevity insurance, takes that type of insurance one step further.

Longevity insurance acts like a typical annuity but instead of paying out immediately upon retirement, benefits wouldn't kick in until at least 10 years after retirement, when most people face the prospect of running out of money.

The market for deferred income annuities has grown from a $200 million a year industry in 2011 to $2.2 billion in 2013, according to Joe Montminy, assistant vice president, annuity research, for LIMRA Secure Retirement Institute in Connecticut, an organization that provides unbiased research and education to the retirement industry.

So who is buying this form of insurance? Individuals who have saved for retirement outside of their employer, mostly through IRAs.

According to LIMRA, the average amount of DIA insurance purchased in 2013 was $137,000. Due to a July Internal Revenue Service ruling, individuals may now purchase deferred income annuities through their 401(k) or 403(b) retirement plans. The IRS made this possible by eliminating a rule that individuals must start taking money from their retirement plans at age 70 ½.

There is a limit to how much money you can invest in a deferred income annuity through your retirement plan, Montminy said.

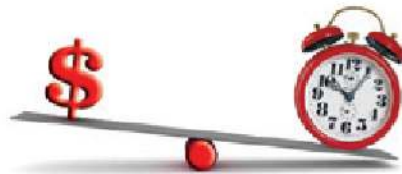

Basically a person can use the lesser of $125,000 or 25 percent of the money held in their retirement plans to invest in this type of annuity through their employer-sponsored retirement plan, he said. The $125,000 limit is smaller than the average amount individuals have been investing in these products to date.

Not many people are purchasing DIAs through their 401(k) plans yet because there are still a host of questions that need to be resolved in how these products are designed, Montminy added. One issue is portability. If you leave your current job, can you take your deferred income annuity with you? There also are issues related to fiduciary responsibility.

Any company that hosts a retirement plan has fiduciary responsibility for making sure that the investments in the plan are in the best interest of their employees.

"Those issues still need to be clarified before we see much intake with those types of products," Montminy said. "The big plus is they've got government support," he said. The government believes these types of products have potential.

Judy McNary, a certified financial planner with McNary Financial Planning in Broomfield, said she has been watching this market closely.

"I haven't recommended [deferred income annuities] to a specific client yet," she said, but she understands why some people would be interested in purchasing them.

"Fewer and fewer people have pensions. Only 29 percent of jobs come with pensions now, outside of Social Security," she said. "For a lot of people, having that stable set of payments coming in can really help."

McNary can see why DIAs and longevity insurance "sound like a good idea. When I looked at them previously, there were a lot of costs associated with purchasing them in terms of annual fees, so it wasn't an inexpensive option. It is not necessarily a fit for everybody. You do pay for that."

Many people, especially baby boomers, have not prepared enough for retirement, and that is a concern, she said.

"If you have longevity in your family and you are concerned about your ability to manage your spending, having a set amount that will be coming in each month can give certain people peace of mind," she said. "If you don't have longevity, it is unlikely you should buy the longevity insurance."

Another downside to purchasing an annuity is that you give up a lot of flexibility. There are "pretty steep penalties if you change your mind and decide you need that money for something else," McNary said.

"To me, the potential for them to be one component of a boomer's overall portfolio makes sense, but I wouldn't want anyone to put the bulk of their savings into them."

Booming to start a business

CARL DIERSCHOW
Small Business Adviser

Using your experience to launch out on your own

I've seen a wide range of people who are a bit older who are starting new businesses. Sometimes it's because a person is laid off and sees a lack of job opportunities that reward experience and maturity.

Sometimes people are just burned out in their current careers, and looking to expand into new and exciting areas. Or perhaps they've been thinking about pursuing a passion that they've wondered about for many years.

It's a common scenario these days, and will only grow as more baby boomers seek quasi-retirement and the economy continues to revive.

If you're pondering this yourself, here are some useful ideas to work on.

First: It's useful to give yourself more time, as it lets you think through options, save up a bit more money, and test the waters. Five years isn't too long – that's essentially what I did before moving into business coaching. But even six months' investment can be highly valuable.

Second: Examine a variety of ways that you might bring your idea to fruition. You could buy a franchise or an entire company. You could start a new company or go into partnership. You could engage in it as a hobby, not intending to make an income. And there's a lot more models out there which might be a great fit for where you want to go.

Third: Create a cushion of savings. This will provide you with seed money without borrowing, give you time to learn as your venture grows, and give you more ability to make long-term decisions rather than becoming frantic.

Fourth: You may have to switch from an "employee mindset" to a "business owner's mindset." You'll have to learn about a bunch of areas that you've never worried about before. But more important, your decisions will shift when you realize that nobody is going to pay you just because you do a good job. Customers will give you their hard-earned cash only when you solve important problems for them.

Fifth: Most scenarios require that you become a super-salesperson. That might be to investors, partners, employees, or customers. But your livelihood will probably be directly related to whether you can sell your ideas and products. Continuously. This can be a hard lesson for people to learn, but beware of thinking that your idea or product "sells itself." That's never true.

All of this may sound like I'm trying to discourage you from venturing out on your own. That's not the case – I've seen many people who are re-energized and ecstatic with their choices. They're learning that hard work can be fun and gratifying when you believe in what you do.

There's a lot of help out there for people who are starting up, so don't think that you have to figure it all out from scratch. Don't just follow your passion without putting a solid business plan behind it.

Start with the Small Business Development Center, the excellent business research section of our local library, industry reports, and people who have done something similar. I recommend that you get engaged with your target market and industry, so you can start seeing what it looks like from the inside.

If you're thinking about buying a franchise or a company, there are experts who focus exclusively on these options. They'll help you find the option which meets your specific goals. More importantly, they'll teach you how to think through the decision. This will help you identify your own blind spots and assumptions.

“There's a lot of help out there for people who are starting up, so don't think that you have to figure it all out from scratch.”

— Carl Dierschow

A business coach can be quite valuable if you're trying to create your business plan. Some coaches and consultants may have valuable industry expertise, but you may not want to be so narrowly focused that you miss your personal goals. Especially if you want to explore something innovative and unique, you'll want to work with someone who can help you think outside the current boundaries of your industry.

There's a very real danger if you wait until you lose your current job before starting this work. If it's going to take you three years' investment before you can start gaining a reliable income, will you have enough money in savings to tide you over? And three years can be a short time for many kinds of businesses.

Instead, get the process started now, while you have some income. Start building on that idea that's been nagging you for years now, and look at whether it will be possible to succeed. Take the time to learn, grow, and adapt to changing conditions.

Then, if and when you retire or get laid off, you'll be able to move into your next venture much more easily.

TOP 6 SPORTS for baby boomers

BY MELISSA SCHAAF news@bizwest.com

SWIMMING

Whether it's laps in the pool or a water aerobics class, baby boomers are making quite a splash. According to the Sporting Good Manufacturers Association, swimming for fitness is the leading inspirational activity for boomers. Not only are more boomers looking to get wet for fitness purposes, the National Swimming Pool Foundation states that more boomers are going poolside to learn the fundamentals of swimming to gain confidence and reduce the fear of drowning.

Aquatic fitness is a good form of low-impact exercise that is easy on bones and joints. However, simply being submerged in the pool can have health benefits as well. Cardiac output is heightened when submerged due to hydrostatic pressure on the body. This forces more blood to the central organs and mimics effects caused by aerobic exercise. As boomers continue to age, more of them take to the waters for exercise. It may not be the fountain of youth, but the health benefits of aquatic fitness may increase a lifespan.

TENNIS

There's no love lost on the tennis court among boomers, who make up 12 percent of the 27.8 million tennis players in the United States.

The aerobic and cardiovascular benefits attract and retain boomers, especially those who are members of a club that provide courts. Boomers make up 22 percent in overall revenue for the tennis industry with 1.07 million falling in the 'frequent player' category.

From 2009 to 2011, cardio tennis experienced double-digit gains in overall population, driven in part by the boomer generation, as well as the rise of social media networking, according to a report from Sporting Good Manufacturers Association. As more individuals fall into the 'boomer' category every day, the tennis industry, among other sporting industries, is shifting campaigns to target what will soon be the largest age group in the U.S. According to Racquet Sports Industry Magazine, 10,000 people every day will turn 65 for the next 19 years. The same article describes boomers as "The 'New' Older Market," stating that 76 percent of Americans plan on a more active lifestyle during retirement.

CYCLING

Often cited as the seventh most popular recreational activity in the U.S., cycling is an alluring sport among all age groups; however, trends show that individuals spend more days a year on a bike as they age, based on an article by Glusken Townley Group LLC.

IMAGE BY MARK WILCOX / WYOMING BUSINESS REPORT

Boomers make up one third of all bike riders, according to a National Sporting Goods Association (NSGA) report. Male boomers are more frequent cyclists than female boomers. Among male boomers, 54.5 percent of them bicycle for fitness, transportation, recreation, or a combination. Male boomers bike an average of 61.7 days out of the year. Female enthusiasm for cycling is a touch lower. Only 45.5 percent of female boomers are frequent cyclists, averaging 59.9 days out of the year.

Interestingly enough, these numbers increase, both in average participation and the number of yearly biking days as individuals age. Those 75 years and older have the highest percentage of cyclists in their age group, and spend more days out of the year on a bike than any other age group.

The cycling industry is sitting pretty when it comes to revenue. According to the Outdoor Industry Association, Americans annually spend more on bicycling gear and trips ($81 billion) than they do on airplane tickets and fees ($51 billion). And, if cycling trends continue to grow as people age, there is great potential for growth on the horizon.

FISHING

Baby boomers are casting out more lines than ever. According to a 5-year study from the National Survey of Fishing, Hunting, and Wildlife-Associated Recreation, baby boomer fishing participation has increased 28 percent. This is partly attributed to retiree migration to coastal areas. Tropical climates and a laid-back atmosphere are luring boomers out of corporate America and directly on to sandy beaches. This directly correlates with an increase in the number of fishing boomers.

Boomers aren't the only ones with bobbers in the water, though. Fishing has seen an increase in participation across age groups as reported by the U.S. Census. The number of people fishing in 2011 was 11 per-

Baby boomers are being reeled in as fishing participation grows. In fact, 13.3 million boomers could be spotted with a pole in the water in 2011 and numbers are expected to increase.

HIKING

Baby boomers are taking time to enjoy the scenery. Outdoor recreational activities are popular among boomers and seniors. The Sporting Goods Manufacturers Association reported that more than 1.5 million Americans age 55 and older hike at least 15 days a year.

With the rise in social media, hiking groups have become a popular way to connect with other boomers interested in hiking.

Hiking can be leisurely or difficult based on an individual's fitness level and desire. This appeals to a wide range of boomers as age can take a toll on the body. Additionally, no special equipment is required.

As baby boomers age, the average age of hikers will increase. Three out of every ten hikers will fall into the age group 55 and up. According to The Outdoor Foundation, a third of outdoor aficionados, including hikers and campers, are 45 years of age and older.

Based on a study by the Outdoor Foundation, hiking is the number five most popular outdoor activity with 12 percent of Americans, or 34.5 million, participating annually.

YOGA

Spandex-clad, body-contorting, deep-breathing yoga enthusiasts aren't limited to 20-somethings. Baby boomers are grabbing mats and heading to yoga studios and fitness clubs across the country to find tranquility.

Balance, strength, and flexibility can wane with age; yoga focuses on improving these areas in individuals and modifying the practice to fit a person's ability. Recent studies have shown that Yoga can also balance blood pressure, and that the breathing techniques can cleanse air passages.

More and more people are taking advantage of the health benefits of yoga. Yoga is the 'popular girl' of the fitness industry. Since 2001, the number of people participating in yoga classes has grown 16 percent per year.

The yoga industry has not lost sight of the ever-increasing enthusiasm and popularity of the practice. In fact, it capitalized on it. According to Headwaters MB, the number of yoga and pilates studios has grown 5.9 percent per year from 2007 to 2012, with 26,610 current studios in business. Additionally, revenue in this industry has grown 7.7 percent per year faster than any other fitness industry except fitness DVD production.

Boomers are all about joining health and fitness clubs. Since 1997, health club members aged 55 and older have increased by a whopping 519 percent, as compared to 52 percent growth in the 18 to 34 age group.

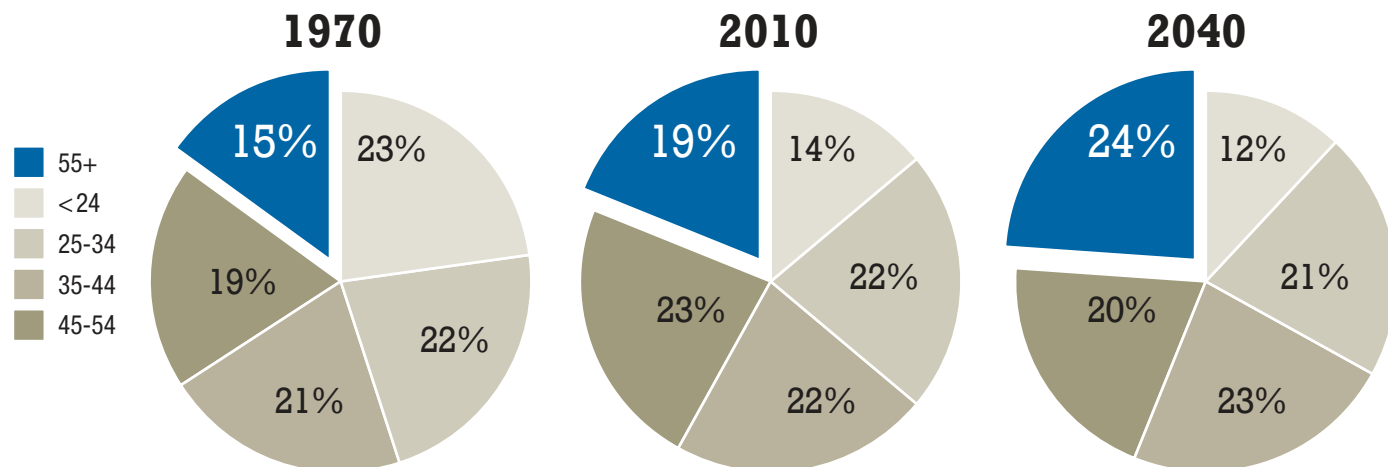

Since 2001, the number of people participating in yoga classes has grown 16 percent per year.

Aging of the labor force

Changes in the age distribution of the Colorado population combined with increased participation in older age groups will result in increased shares of the older labor force.

State from 3

Colorado's 65-plus population will grow even faster, increasing from 555,000 in 2010 to 1.243 million in 2030.

While 45- to 64-year-olds are the highest-earning and highest-spending demographic, Garner said recently, the 65-plus population has some of the lowest incomes and lowest spending on goods.

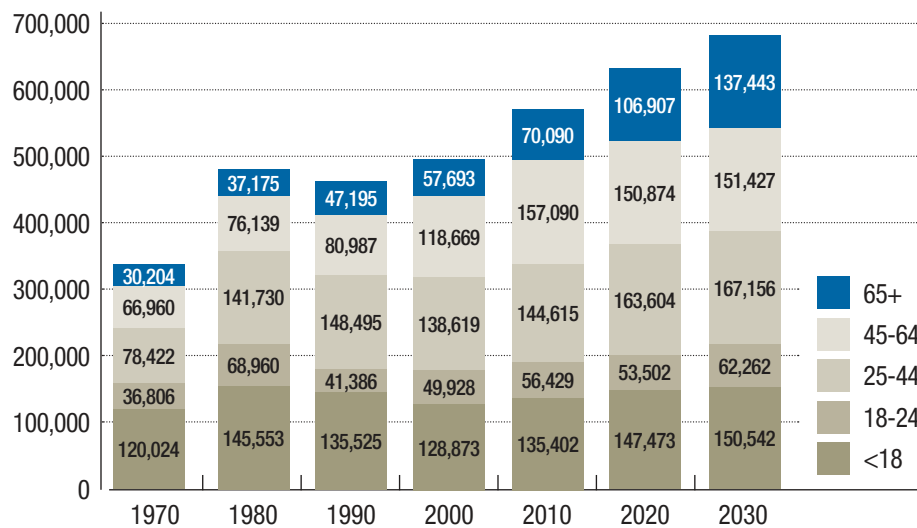

"Driven, in large part, by the changing age distribution of Colorado, growth rates of the labor force are expected to slow significantly over the forecast horizon of 2040 as compared to historical growth," DeGroen wrote in a recent report. "We are currently nearing the middle of a decade during which Colorado's older population will rapidly become a larger share of its total population."

The trend will end the state's "demographic dividend" and leave Colorado looking much more like the nation as a whole, she said – but with population of seniors higher than the national average.

"The labor force in 2040 will look considerably different from today's labor force," DeGroen's report summary stated. "The labor force in 2040 will be much larger in number, it will be older, and it will include a larger share of females. Additionally, the labor force will be smaller relative to the total population it supports. Impacts include increased competition for the pool of skilled workers available, the potential slowing of housing development, and downward pressure on income" – as well as increased demands on social services.

Colorado's labor force also is aging because people are leaving the labor force later, DeGroen said. The median age of persons leaving the labor force between 2000 and 2010 was 66.8, but is expected to increase to 69.5 between 2035 and 2040.

"Where do the 65-plus spend their money?" Garner asked during a keynote address in September at BizWest's Bixpo business expo in Loveland. "Those are the occupations that will be growing fast. ... They're ready to un-stuff. So thinking about less goods, more services is really where a lot of our occupations are going to be growing."

The third act

CARRIE PINSKY
Careers

The real coming of age

In the 1900s the average lifespan was 47 years. Today, it is not uncommon to reach the 100 year mark. If you are reading this magazine, chances are good that you have another 30 years of life ahead of you. For many of us, this is a daunting reality.

The million-dollar question is what do you want those years to look like? Most of us are figuring it out as we go along. That is because we lack language, common understanding, and resources about “retirement” and next chapter planning.

Retirement is no longer an event that occurs once we reach a certain age. It is an ongoing process that happens gradually over time. Many of us will continue working long past what was once considered typical retirement age. This may be by choice or due to necessity. I don’t need to reinforce the point that it can be incredibly challenging to plan to live for an extra three or four decades!

Baby boomers find themselves once again on the forefront of intense social change. Old models of human development and aging label this time of our lives as a decline. There is a pervasive belief in our culture that once we reach midlife, it is “all down hill from here.”

Actually, many of us are just beginning to find ourselves in our 50s. This is a time when we come into our own. Boomers have an opportunity to redefine the “third act” as a real coming of age.

In her Ted Talk on aging, Jane Fonda, who is now in her late 70s, offered a unique metaphor for our third act. She likened this stage of our lives to moving up a staircase. Fonda, ever the social activist, is helping change the old paradigm about aging from one of decay and degeneration to one of “ascension that brings us into a state of wholeness, authenticity and wisdom.”

This concept is being reinforced by science, research, and the work of career experts who are bringing forth this idea that we continue to develop over our entire lifespans. We don’t stop evolving and growing just because we reach a certain age. Unfortunately, new ideas about aging have not yet entered the common consciousness.

I recently facilitated a workshop for a group of baby boomers. I was talking about authenticity and being “real.” You might imagine that a room of baby boomers would easily understand that concept. After all, many boomers were former hippies who wanted to change the world.

Ironically, many of the people in the audience were scratching their heads about what it meant to be authentic. I found myself struggling to explain the concept because it seemed so obvious to me.

Simply stated, authenticity is a state of congruence between our inner being and our outer expression. When we live authentically, we become more of who we already are. Many of us have been so busy making a living and raising families that we have lost touch with who we are as individuals.

How can we reconnect with our authentic selves? What can boomers do to create a more satisfying and fulfilling third act?

LIFE REVIEW

Reviewing our personal history is a great place to start. By looking at our past, we can review what has worked well and what has brought us the most joy. Our past holds clues to passions and interests that may have fallen off our radars.

A life review not only gives us a chance to reconnect with our own desires, it also offers a chance to forgive others and ourselves for past mistakes. Now we can begin our third act with clarity about what we want and need. And we can move forward without being weighed down by unfinished emotional business.

HIT THE RESET BUTTON

Our values are not static, they actually change as we move through life. Sometimes we hold onto old beliefs that no longer make sense for who we are and what we need today. If you feel like you are not living the life you want, it is a good sign that you need to re-examine your values.

Once we clarify our values, we can use them to inform our decisions and choices. They become the guiding lights for this leg of our journey. Value clarification acts like a reset button so we can live more authentically.

STAY GREEN AND GROWING

When we stop learning and developing ourselves as human beings, we begin to feel like “dead wood.” Continual learning is about having an open mind that is willing to look at new ideas and consider different perspectives. It is also about following our interests and staying involved in activities that bring us joy and provide meaning to our lives.

GIVE BACK

Most of us want to keep contributing in one way or another during our third act. Work can be incredibly fulfilling and provides benefits beyond the paycheck. It offers structure, continued learning, social stimulation, and a way to share our talents with the world. Volunteering or mentoring offers similar rewards.

Some boomers are taking on entirely new career adventures while others are “right-sizing” and exploring different ways of working or volunteering that fit their current needs and desires. It is important to take a fresh look at opportunities to make sure they match our updated values and desired lifestyles.

I don’t want to glamorize growing older. Longevity will bring new challenges to our generation. Yet, there seems a real opportunity here as well. It is an opportunity to rediscover and bring forth our inner truth, our hard-won wisdom, and our passions - perhaps for the very first time.

Our third act offers up a chance not so much to reinvent ourselves but to finally realize our fullest potential.

Real estate

Did patio homes survive the bust?

Before the housing bust and economic downturn, demand was high for patio homes and 55-plus housing communities. After the bust, demand was still there, but builders in Colorado and Wyoming weren't building these types of communities anymore.

"Nobody was building in 2008, 2009 and 2010," said Lisa Wade, president of the Boulder Area Realtor Association and a Realtor with Re/Max of Boulder.

Builders are just now getting back to it because they can now borrow money from lenders, she added.

"Many projects have been on the back burner for a couple of years," Wade said.

There has been a backlash in the city of Boulder—played out in the letters to the editor—about all of the building that is taking place currently, but most of the projects have been in the works for years, she said. Builders are only now able to get the funding they need to complete projects that were approved before the economic downturn.

There have not been a lot of home options for baby boomers who want to get rid of their big, multistory homes in favor of something more senior friendly: ranch-style with no stairs, not a lot of landscaping to take care of and with all the amenities they were used to in their previous homes.

"There's not much in Boulder County," Wade said. To find 55 and over communities people need to look in Broomfield and Westminster, where new communities are being built.

Boulder Creek Neighborhoods built a patio home community in Louisville, called Steel Ranch Patio Homes, that sold like hotcakes.

Wade said she asked Boulder Creek Builders if they could build something similar in Boulder and the response was that it could never happen because land is scarce and what land is available is very expensive.

It would cost an additional $200,000 or more to build patio homes in Boulder, she said.

"That prices people out. I'd like to buy a patio home in Boulder, but I can't afford $650,000 and that is probably what it would take to get new construction, if you could find some land," Wade said.

Land is key to building new developments and that is fairly scarce around Boulder, Loveland and Fort Collins.

"It's gotten past the point where people don't want to see housing segregated that way. We don't think about what is a good house for an old person or a younger person," said Greg Miedema, executive officer for the Home Builders Association of Northern Colorado, or NOCO HBA. "We like to see aging in place for all ages and situations."

The housing market crash changed the way people think about buying homes, he said. "It is no longer a thing where you can plan on buying a new house every 10 years and make enough equity to make that economically viable," Miedema said.

Most home buyers are looking for homes that will last them for between 10 and 25 years. Home builders have had to adapt to that attitude, coming up with home designs that will remain "comfortable regardless of [a person's] stage in life or regardless of their physical abilities," he said.

"People are getting to the point, especially as we see land getting scarcer and scarcer and prices escalating, that they are not willing to gamble that they will have enough equity built in to buy another house," he added. "While real estate continues to be a good investment over the long-term, it is not something you want to go through every 10 years."

Many builders are including so-called twin homes in their developments, including in the Centerra area of Loveland and in Water Valley in Windsor. Twin homes are the new duplexes. They share one common wall and garages are located in one place to bring the costs down.

"Every builder is looking for a product line to help them meet a better price point, such as patio homes and twin homes," Miedema said.

Ranch homes are still popular, but "you are not going to find those in a community setting," he said. It is hard to find homes in Fort Collins, Greeley and Loveland that are less than $300,000. First time home buyers are finding it very difficult to get into the market.

So what is popular among the 55 and older generation? Any home where the home owners' association takes care of the landscaping and snow birds can lock their homes up and leave for the winter, Wade said.

Most people want at least 2,000 square feet in a ranch-style home with a basement. They don't want a lot of stairs, but they want something that looks modern and has all of the amenities, she said.

Brandon Myers, a broker associate with Re/Max Alliance in Fort Collins and chair of the Fort Collins Board of Realtors Young Professionals Network, said that in his experience, baby boomers are not just sizing down to get rid of the cost or have less of a house to upkeep. They want nicer features, he said.

"In Northern Colorado there is still a market for the boomer generation, patio home, snow bird-type buyer," Myers said. "We will get a lot of snow birds, someone who wants a house they can just leave and all the maintenance will just be taken care of. They can leave with no worries and come back in the summer when they want to live in the house."

ARE ALL HOSPICES THE SAME?

Non-profit and for-profit hospices are different. A non-profit uses all resources to care for patients and provide support to caregivers and is not concerned with creating shareholder value.

Review:

Stir Kinetic smart desk makes you stand up

(AP) — You may want to sit down for this. Then get up. Then sit down again.

That's because there's a desk out there that tells you to do exactly that.

The Stir Kinetic is probably the world's first "smart" desk. It has a built-in touch screen, so you can see this either as a desk with a smartphone in it or a smartphone with a desk attached.

Why does a desk need to be smart? One answer is that it has motors and needs smarts to control them. The motors raise and lower the desk surface. You program it with the height you need for sitting and the height you need for standing. It moves, quietly, between them.

The other reason the desk needs smarts is that you don't have them. Well, not you, in particular, but people like you. Apparently we know that sitting all day is not good for us, but when we get motorized desks, we don't use them very much.

"Users were, in general, positive to the worktables, but showed poor compliance in using them," as some Swedish researchers put it in 2005.

Stir was founded by a former Apple engineer, making it sort of like the Nest thermostat of desks. Both are everyday objects imbued with top-notch software. The Nest figures out when you're home and varies the temperature accordingly; the Stir desk knows if you're in front of it.

The Stir knows if it's at the standing or sitting level and keeps track of how long you've been in that position. After 20 minutes or whatever interval you select, it will tell you to switch positions. It does so by "breathing" — it gently moves up an inch, then settles down. Nothing further happens unless you tap the touch screen twice to confirm you want to change positions.

You can buy a "dumb" motorized standing desk for $1,500. There are also some nifty designs with mechanical counterbalances for the same price. There was even a Kickstarter crowdfunding campaign offering a bare-bones motorized table for $369.

The Stir Kinetic costs $3,890, plus tax and $299 for shipping. So if you disregard the other qualities of the desk (and the white-glove delivery service), you're paying more than $2,000 for its smarts, which do the same thing as any number of free timer apps.

A standing desk isn't going to do you any good on its own, says Alan Hedge, a professor of ergonomics at Cornell University. What helps is moving around a lot and switching positions.

"If you're sitting in a static posture or standing in a static posture, that's not particularly helpful, because muscles fatigue very quickly and the circulatory system is not being helped," Hedge says. "When you're moving around ... it activates what's called the muscle pump that helps to return blood back to the heart."

So the $2,000 question here is whether you have the willpower and presence of mind to do that without a smart desk reminding you and helping you track your behavior.

I used the Stir for a week, and the benefits of the sit-stand regime were pretty obvious. I felt more alert at work and less tired at the end of each day. I'm less sure about the benefit of the reminders. They tended to come at the wrong times. Bloating with lunch, I didn't want to stand up. When on a roll, I didn't want to sit down.

The Stir is supposed to learn your habits, much like the Nest. But it takes four weeks for it to get your measure and start to use that knowledge to time its prompts. As I had it for only a week, I couldn't test this feature.

I was, of course, popular in the office that week. Everyone came by to look at the fancy new desk with its shiny, Apple-like white acrylic top. I was happy to demonstrate its features, which include USB and traditional AC power outlets hidden under lids. There's plenty of space to hide your laptop power brick under these lids, too.

Through the touch screen, you can connect the desk to Wi-Fi so it can download software updates. If you use a Fitbit exercise band, you can also have it send your standing times to Fitbit.com, which computes how many calories you've used that way.

All in all, it was a very pleasant experience. The worst I can say is that the touch screen is fairly sensitive and reacts not just to finger touches, but also to random objects landing on it. If a book, phone or pen edges on to the screen, it can start the desk surface moving. The company says it shouldn't be happening.

My remedy was to lock the screen by swiping down. This adds the extra step of unlocking it when you want to change positions.

But the question remains in my mind: Would I feel just as good with a $1,500 sit-stand desk that doesn't remind me to move?

If money is no object, by all means get the Stir. But there's quite a bit happening in the world of sit-stand desks, as evidenced by the recent Kickstarter campaign. It wouldn't surprise me if desks that are cheaper, but just as capable, are just around the corner.

Two great markets — one great newspaper.
