When Poudre Valley Hospital was built in 1925, we fed patients by tending our own vegetables, hogs, sheep and chickens on the surrounding 40 acres.

A lot has changed in the last 87 years. Our hospital grew. We added Medical Center of the Rockies in Loveland, and Colorado Health Medical Group to serve northern Colorado.

One thing hasn't changed: Our commitment to northern Colorado. Patients expect that little something extra from us, and we like it that way.

So while you will see a new logo and a new name joining the hospital, this will always be our community. You will always be the reason we do what we do.

Bridging

generational differences

Longer lifespans, leaner retirement
plans mean a more diverse workforce

BY MAGGIE SHAFER

At first glance, you wouldn't notice anything missing from The Group Inc. Real Estate's main office in Fort Collins. A youthful front-desk attendant greets visitors, well-dressed professionals of all ages filter in and out, and prospective homebuyers wait in oversized armchairs, flipping through magazines.

Nothing out of the ordinary for a busy real estate office.

What isn't so obvious is what's not there: locks. Not a single interior office or conference room in the entire two-story, 20,500-square foot building is equipped with a keyhole, latch or deadbolt. Not one.

“Ultimately, there is trust,” said 40-year-old Robin Strong, a realtor with the Group since 2001, “and our individual success is based off everyone’s success. Regardless of how long they’ve been here.”

For the Group, this means allowing their industry’s newest faces into the offices and meeting rooms of the seasoned veterans, to soak in the knowledge and expertise that only years on the job can impart.

In turn, the younger realtors share their energy, new ideas and – perhaps most importantly – technology know-how.

A symbiotic relationship between old and young, beginners and experts, Facebook-dependent and Facebook-afraid.

Multigenerational workplaces like the Group’s are a growing reality in the United States. A combination of longer lives and leaner retirement plans have kept people in the workforce longer, often into their 70s and even 80s.

With the entrance of Millennials (those born between 1980 and 2000), it is now the norm for offices to house a mix of committed company lifers and fresh-faced college grads in their first pair of slacks. Millennials are expected to comprise half of the workforce by 2020.

And like an episode of the “Real World,” these generations are thrown into the same room 40-plus hours a week and asked to do something productive together.

But unlike a reality show, conflict doesn’t translate to higher ratings, and definitely not to higher profits.

In order to succeed in the current climate, businesses have not only had to learn to deal with the generational span, but embrace it.

“The more diversity you have, the better your solutions can be,” said Ava Diamond, president of workplace consultants the Diamond Success Group.

“You have people with a wide range of life experience, training, organizational experience and styles focused on your business and your customers. But this only works when there is a culture of mutual respect and support, and people are eager to work with and learn from each other.”

In the multi-generational environment, communication can be the biggest stumbling block to success, said Dr. Stephanie Smith, the public education coordinator for the American Psychological Association.

Different generations often prefer different modalities. Where Millennials would rather text or email, Boomers are more likely to call or prefer in-person interactions. A workplace that offers and utilizes various methods is more likely to keep everyone happy and productive, Smith said.

When Mark Goldrich started working at The Group Inc., contracts were handwritten, homes were unlocked with actual keys and business was done face-to-face.

Times have changed.

Goldrich said he’s relied on his younger co-workers to help him navigate the new world order.

“I’ve seen realtors who didn’t want to make the changes and embrace the new technology and they eventually fall out because their functionality is limited,” said Goldrich a 65-year-old Group veteran. “You have to accept the technology in order to communicate with a younger generation.”

The life/work balance is another area where the generations differ.

According to a study published in 2011 by Achieve Global, company loyalty and work ethic vary from generation to generation. Work is less central for Millennials, and they tend to be less committed to a particular company. Their older coworkers on average have a stronger work ethic and place less emphasis on leisure.

But that doesn’t necessarily make Generation Y’ers bad to work with. The Pew Research Center has dubbed the Millennial generation as “confident, self-expressive, liberal, upbeat and receptive to new ideas and ways of living.” This type of worker is more likely to demand flexible working hours, faster promotions and greater responsibilities. The difficulty can be managing fairly to ensure that older workers don’t feel the up-and-coming are being given special treatment.

Another area to be aware of in a multi-generational environment: making age a bigger deal than it is.

Joe Rosse, professor of management at the University of Colorado Boulder, said age-cohort differences are overblown. What’s more important is what coworkers have in common.

“Often people are looking for the same things: a good work environment, fair pay, etc.,” Rosse said. “The differences aren’t as big as people think. Fundamentally the way people respond to work will be similar. The commonalities will be more important than the differences.”

So what’s in the middle of the Venn diagram of all generations? Diamond said values.

“It has been shown that all generations have similar values, but how they define them is different,” she said. “For example, the value of respect. For older employees, it might mean, ‘Give my opinions the weight they deserve because of my years of experience,’ whereas for younger employees, it might be, ‘Listen to me and pay attention to what I have to say. Just because I’m young doesn’t mean I don’t have great ideas.’”

The type of workplace that fosters this kind of respect is typically led by someone who champions it themselves, Rosse said.

“Any good manager asks himself or herself, what do my employees bring to the table?” he said. Having a collaborative style and asking all employees for input (regardless of age) builds a culture of respect among the staff for leadership and for each other.

“And that (respect) is a good thing in any management position.”

Smith’s advice to Baby Boomers is to stay open-minded. Taking on the posture of student, regardless of age or station, allows for continued growth and mutual respect.

“There are few of us who can’t learn and grow from being around and interacting with others,” she said. “Taking an adversarial (us vs. them) stance at work is not productive and can cause stress as well.

“Taking a step back and realizing that while your own history and experience is valuable, other members of your team have valuable insights and inputs as well.”

When The Group began hiring members of Generation Y, Strong recognized their understanding of (and ability to market to) the next generation of home-buyer, a skill that the older generation could glean from.

At the same time, Tracie Milton, a 31-year-old realtor with The Group, has appreciated the open-door policy of her older mentors, and their willingness to teach.

Marketing to boomers

BY IVY HUGHES
news@ncbr.com

The notion is familiar to most: The aging baby boomer generation is the country's largest and most affluent.

Just how affluent? According to the U.S. Bureau of Labor Statistics, boomers and older Americans contribute $2.6 trillion to the U.S. economy each year.

Yet as they reach their retirement years — the oldest boomers turned 65 last year — many businesses seem to be overlooking the huge business opportunity this generation presents.

"This is the wealthiest bunch of old people we've ever had in the country and they will spend money differently than the young," said Bill Dunkelberg, chief economist for the National Federation of Independent Businesses.

In a recent report produced with marketing firm BoomAgers, Nielsen found that while boomers control most of the money, "less than 5 percent of advertising is geared towards them."

Most of mainstream advertising is aimed at younger demographics, which is a mistake, according to Nielsen.

Maturing boomers obviously spend more on health care, but they also spend more on travel and myriad other services.

Predictably, they love spending huge amounts of money on family — eye-popping amounts.

"They contribute 40 to 50 percent of all spending on their grandchildren," said

They're not the type of consumers that really stop spending.
Instead, they just reallocate.

Brent Green, president of Denver-based Green Associates Inc. and author of several marketing books.

So why are so many businesses either ignoring aging boomers or portraying them as incompetent and, well, old?

“There’s a predisposition not to market to people over 50, or figure they’ll get the drift or blow back of any marketing, but that is incorrect,” Green said. “If they are not included, they will notice.”

Green said ski resorts, specifically Aspen, have successfully targeted boomers by creating and marketing family vacation packages — which are often funded by boomers. They’ve also created programs such as ski safety classes that are attractive to boomers who want to ski the bumps but want to do it safely.

The Broadmoor Hotel in Colorado Springs did something similar, selling its golf course townhomes to boomers as a good place to host family get-togethers.

“They recognized the opportunity for grandparents to finance family get-togethers, the idea being that generations will come together and grandma and grandpa will pay the freight,” Green said.

Successfully targeting boomers has a big payoff. As might be expected, targeting them with silly, inane or childlike messages doesn’t work.

“There’s a corner of the mind that says you cannot make fun of gay people, women or Latinos,” Green said. “What’s left is — let’s make a funny commercial about old people. Boomers notice it and they don’t like it.”

Of course, the still-weak economy has created problems, too.

Angela Cortez, director of communications for AARP Colorado, said the uncertain recovery has made boomers hesitant to spend in areas outside of health care.

“We recently completed surveys nationally and in Colorado and the baby boomers are very insecure about their retirement,” Cortez said. “Three in four boomers, or 75 percent, believe they will have to delay retirement. They’re living longer in general, so they’ll probably work longer.”

Green said this isn’t a bad thing.

“Maybe there was a plan for a second home that didn’t happen and that industry got hurt because consumers pulled back, but boomers are not the type of consumers that stop spending,” Green said. “They reallocate.”

That reallocation is affecting small businesses and startups. Bill Zinke, president of the Center for Productive Longevity in Boulder, said boomers are not only starting businesses, they’re advising and consulting existing businesses.

“They have experience, expertise, seasoned judgment and proven performance,” Zinke said. “It’s not just a nicety but a necessity to utilize this talent pool. People will need this talent pool.”

According to Zinke, this affects the economy in three ways. One, younger startups get access to information and relationships they wouldn’t have. Two, boomers

“There’s a predisposition not to market to people over 50. ... (But) if they are not included, they will notice.”

— Brent Green,

Green Associates Inc.

who were expected to retire are putting money back into the economy by starting their own businesses. Three, by working, these boomers are prolonging the sustainability of so-called entitlement programs such as Social Security and Medicare. They’re also supplementing a shrinking workforce.

“If we encourage these baby boomers to continue in productive activities after they leave their regular full-time jobs, we have them contributing to instead of drawing from the economy,” Zinke said.

Boomer contributions don’t stop at for-profit enterprises.

“Boomers are showing dramatic contributions to education in the form of community colleges and the community college system knows that,” Green said. “They are significant contributors to non-profits.”

The arts and entertainment realms are especially benefiting.

Venues and directors that have successfully marketed boomers are doing very well. The “Jersey Boys” show about the Four Seasons was a huge hit in Denver this summer.

“Obviously the ‘Jersey Boys’ was a pop group in the 1960s, so if you looked at the audience that filled that venue, you kind of get it,” Green said.

They are the next generation of entrepreneurs

Which age group has the lowest rate of entrepreneurial activity?

- A: 55-64
- B: 20-34
- C: 35-50

What is the average age of U.S.-born technology founders when they started their companies?

- A: 25
- B: 18
- C: 39

If you answered A, B and C respectively, you aced this test. Next question: Were you surprised by the answers?

You shouldn't be. In fact, twice as many men and women age 50 and older start tech companies than those age 25 and younger.

According to a 2009 study by the Ewing Marion Kauffman Foundation, more baby boomers than ever are starting second and third careers and hiring themselves to run the companies — so much so that AARP and the U.S. Small Business Administration have entered into an unprecedented partnership to help boomers become more successful as entrepreneurs.

"We've seen a growing percentage of the 55-64 age group trending toward entrepreneurship in the past 15 years," said Jean Setzfang, AARP's vice president for financial security. "Not only is the average age of entrepreneurs older, but the sustainability of their companies is higher. They're having better success rates. We know that this is a good equation. So we set up this partnership to allow people who are thinking this through — in essence, kicking the tires — access to resources to help them think through the concept."

Boomers are living longer, healthier lives and wanting to stay engaged and vital. Years of experience and knowledge make the more than 70 million Americans in the over-50 set well-positioned to become the next generation of entrepreneurs. In fact, 7.4 million American workers age 50 and up are self-employed.

A recent USA Today/Gallup poll found that 63 percent of U.S. adults plan on working during their retirement. While some of that may be attributed to the floundering economy, most claimed it was because they enjoy work.

Setzfang pointed to economic factors contributing to the trend. The recession saw unemployment numbers spiking, not just for boomers but across the board.

More importantly, there is a broader economic issue for the aging population in the shift in the way people are preparing for retirement. Traditional pension plans are extinct; employers are no longer setting money aside so that retirees can expect a lifelong check in the mail. The onus has been placed on the employee to save for retirement, and for many people those funds don't add up to enough to live on. The need to work is greater. Entrepreneurship is the answer to economic issues and the desire to stay productive and find meaning in life.

The initiative between SBA and AARP officially launched on Oct. 2. The goal is to put 100,000 boomers in touch with the resources that can help them through the process of becoming a business owner, even if it’s just planting the seeds of entrepreneurship. AARP has plans for an online tool kit that will direct its users to SBA resources.

“Certainly people can go to their local SBA offices to access this information, but we’re providing a clearing house ... to make finding this easier,” Setzfand said. “It also gives them the flexibility to work privately in their own homes or find a face-to-face meeting or educational opportunity.”

For sale: Boomers' businesses

— but for how much?

Boulder-based Front Range Business VP Paul Chambliss tries to help business owners overcome their emotional investment so they can sell their businesses.

When it comes time to sell and retire, many find themselves emotionally unprepared.

BY MICHELLE VENUS
news@ncbr.com

It started as a dream. An idea. “What if I started a business doing (fill in the blank)?”

In the beginning it was just you — and maybe a partner or two. The business ran on blood, sweat and tears, with some heart and soul thrown in for good measure — and a chunk of your personal financial resources, too.

So perhaps it's no surprise that when the time comes to sell the business and retire, some baby boomers just aren't prepared.

They may not have a full understanding of their company's actual value. Or perhaps their inability to let go undermines the sale.

“The emotional investment is why it's so difficult for most people to sell their businesses,” said Paul Chambliss, vice president of Front Range Business Inc., a Boulder-based brokerage firm that facilitates selling owner-operated businesses. Chambliss has helped hundreds of owners sell their businesses and has seen successful outcomes as well as monumental failures.

Take, for instance, the owner of a long-established plumbing company who came into FRB's offices ready to sell. Chambliss and his team's valuation produced a figure that was half of what the owner was expecting and said he needed to retire.

"We told him what the value drivers were for his business ... how he could increase profitability and make it more desirable for a buyer, (to make it) transferable, and how to keep the business intact, post-transfer," Chambliss said. Another recommendation was to seek a business coach.

Twelve months later, after working with the business coach and executing all his recommendations, the owner came back, ready to sell a business that had doubled in value. Some of the steps taken were quite simple: Formalizing and documenting processes, creating employee, service, and maintenance manuals, staff training and, most importantly, working on the business, not for the business.

According to Chambliss, too many business owners are so caught up in day-to-day operations that they overlook the aerial view. Owners need to focus on marketing, training and where they want to take their businesses, then plan the route that will get the business to the final destination: a successful and profitable sale.

Sometimes owners sabotage themselves, with heart-breaking results. Chambliss recounted the story of the owner of a retail food business. The owner felt his business was worth significantly more than the valuation and refused to budge from the figure. FRB agreed to take on the engagement, but all the offers came in 30 percent to 40 percent below what the owner wanted to achieve. Eventually, he took the business off the market and continued to run it at a loss. Ultimately, the dominoes began to fall. The business went bankrupt. That domino struck the next one and then the next, and the business owner lost his other retail businesses and real-estate holdings.

"That's an extreme example of failure," Chambliss said. "That sort of emotional investment in a price or a business can take you places that aren't logical, but it does happen. The first instance is more the exception than the rule. That (business) owner was eager for help, eager to take advice, and very motivated to implement the suggestions."

Barbara Findlay Schenck, author of "Selling Your Business for Dummies," recommends that when baby boomer business owners start thinking about an exit, they need to weigh some big questions:

- Do you want an immediate and total exit, or do you want to ease yourself away over a longer time frame?
- Is your business a decent sale prospect — or even a great one? If not, how much time and financial investment will it take to get it into sale-ready shape?
- Are you better off selling to business insiders, family members, employees or associates — or should you seek an outside buyer?
- What is the business worth?

Selling options range from liquidation (selling physical assets and closing up shop) to transferring a portion of ownership and responsibility as part of a plan to stay involved while selling the business in full over time, or selling the business outright to a new owner or owner group.

The more sale-ready the business is, the more it's likely to look like a good deal to buyers and the more apt it is to not only attract a buyer but also to command a

Too many business owners are so caught up in the day-to-day, they're not thinking about how to engineer a successful and profitable sale.

— Paul Chambliss,

Front Range Business Inc.

decent price. That means:

- The business needs to be financially healthy, with growing revenue and earnings.
- It needs to have strong business capabilities and processes.
- It needs to have unique and desirable products and services, a desirable location, a healthy market area and industry sector, clear ownership of modern facilities and equipment or long-term leases on them, strong staffing, a solid customer base, no legal or financial problems and a name and reputation buyers will want to pay for and acquire.
- It needs to be easily transferable to new owners.

As more baby boomers reach retirement age, the buyers' market for their businesses has become very competitive. No demographic behind this one is as large, and subsequently there are fewer buyers.

It's not all bad news. Chambliss is noticing that the market is recovering and has become stable. His firm sees a lot of profit-and-loss statements and says the trend is heading upward.

"It's not a 'hockey-stick' rise," he said. "It's a gradual increase ... and we're not expecting another downturn."

With some careful planning and emotional detachment, Chambliss said, you can successfully sell your business and enjoy those golden years.

The money's there, but when do I take it?

There's a lot to consider before drawing on your Social Security.

BY DAN COOK
news@ncbr.com

To delay or not to delay? That is the question. At least that's the question a lot of baby boomers are asking themselves and their financial advisors these days as they try to decide when to begin taking their Social Security benefits.

Anyone who has paid into Social Security over the years can begin to receive those benefits in their 62nd year. But triggering the payments at 62 means accepting a lower monthly amount than one would receive at the "full" retirement age of 66. Then again, by waiting until age 70 to dip into the Social Security pot, you can expect an even higher monthly amount.

Today, Social Security represents a much more important revenue stream to retirees than it did for previous generations. As Josh Miller, president of Loveland-based Colorado Financial Management Inc., notes, "In the 1990s, people were confident that they could count on their stock market portfolio or their 401(k) or IRAs to support them through retirement. Now, with the volatility in the financial markets, Social Security has become a more important decision."

Many factors must be weighed in the making of this decision. It's a personal choice, Miller says, one in which current financial needs must be balanced against life expectancy, one's ability to continue to earn a living past age 62, spousal considerations and the availability of cash from other existing assets. A person receives an extra 8 percent boost in monthly payments per year of delay after 66, money that can be important if one lives to a ripe old age.

Bryan, a federal government employee who asked that his surname not be used, is facing this quandary. He is 66, is secure in his job and has made the decision not to take Social Security benefits until age 70, when he plans to retire. Although he is a former smoker who retirement thanks to the larger payout.

Yet a Social Security department employee recently told him that he should begin taking benefits now, while still working. "I did the math and believe his advice was off base. My calculations show that I would be losing $44,000 by starting benefits now," Bryan says.

Colorado Financial's Miller isn't second-guessing that call. But he thinks Bryan could potentially forfeit some money by delaying.

"It's a tougher decision at 66, when you're still working," he says. "The statistics show that you need to live longer than 14 years past when you begin to take the benefits for it to pay off. Otherwise, it doesn't pay off, except for a spouse, who will then receive potentially higher payments after you die."

Miller's advice: Visit your local Social Security office, get all the information you can about your accrued benefits, then schedule an appointment with a financial planner to help with your decision.

In the case of Bryan, he will have to make it to age 84 to enjoy his delayed payoff. Informed of this, he decided to check in again with his financial planner to make sure he has all the facts.

Setting up an online account with the Social Security Administration is a good way to determine your level of expected benefits at various ages and to gather other information that will help you in your decision-making process.

Start by going to <https://secure.ssa.gov/RIL/SiView.do>. There, you can create your personal Social Security account. Once you have created the account, you can click on "View estimated benefits" to see what you'd be receiving each month. To see a complete history of your Social Security-related income, click on "View earnings record." This information serves as a good foundation as you approach this all-important decision.

The site offers an array of resources to help one evaluate one's retirement financial needs and objectives and make the best decision possible about when to take benefits.

"There's quite a bit of planning that can be done when all of the factors are considered and one's personal goals are outlined," Miller says. "Should you delay, or take it now? It all comes down to where you're at in your life. Ultimately, only (you) can make that decision."

WHAT SOCIAL SECURITY SAYS

The following advice comes from an article from the Social Security Administration's website titled, "When to start receiving benefits":

Let's say your full retirement age is 66 and your monthly benefit starting at that age is $1,000. If you choose to start getting benefits at age 62, your monthly benefit will be reduced by 25 percent to $750 to account for the longer period of time you receive benefits. This is generally a permanent reduction in your monthly benefit.

If you choose to not receive benefits until age 70, you would increase your monthly benefit amount to $1,320. This increase is from delayed retirement credits you get for your decision to postpone receiving benefits past your full retirement age. The benefit amount at age 70 in this example is 32 percent more than you would receive per month if you chose to start getting benefits at full retirement age. ...

When you reach your full retirement age, you can work and earn as much as you want and still receive your full Social Security benefit payment. If you are younger than full retirement age and if your earnings exceed certain dollar amounts, some of your benefit payments during the year will be withheld. This does not mean you must try to limit your earnings. If we withhold some of your benefits because you continue to work, we will pay you a higher monthly benefit amount when you reach your full retirement age. In other words, if you would like to work and earn more than the exempt amount, you should know that it will not, on average, reduce the total value of lifetime benefits you receive from Social Security — and may actually increase them.

has also battled weight problems, he is generally in good health and has good health insurance. His wife is considerably younger than he is and has a good job. Income for the couple is not an issue.

Bryan has faith in his financial planner's projected life expectancy for him of 82 and decided that, by waiting until 70 to begin taking benefits, he could better enjoy

Boomers at work:

Planning the next chapter

Despite efforts to prevent age-discrimination in the workplace, there still remains an assumption in our culture that people “should” retire by a certain age.

There is a subtle but pervasive notion that something must be wrong if a person is still working past age 65. If we continue working, we may feel a sense of shame or perhaps disappointment that life did not work out as planned.

In reality, there is a new normal taking place.

Traditional views on retirement simply no longer make sense. In the “Big Shift — Navigating the New Stage Beyond Midlife,” Marc Freedman writes, “While we have been remarkably adept at extending lives, our imagination and innovation in remaking the shape of those longer lives have been struggling to keep pace.”

According to Freedman, in the year 1900, the average lifespan was 47 years. Today, living to the 100-year mark is becoming increasingly common.

What are we to do during those extra years of life? One can only play so much golf. More importantly, most retirement accounts cannot support 30 years of living without working.

As with all social movements and changes, we often need new language to begin influencing different ways of thinking.

Jackie Peila-Shuster, an assistant professor in Counseling and Career Development, believes the word “retirement” has outlived its usefulness. She prefers to call it “next chapter planning,” because really, it is simply transitioning to a new phase of one’s life.

Older workers typically bring a wealth of experience to the table.

Peila-Shuster offers some good advice: “Take time for self-reflection to tap into your motivated skills. The key is to look not only at what you do well, but also at what you enjoy doing.”

For example, you may be an expert Excel user but you cringe at the thought of sitting at a desk creating spreadsheets. You may have years of experience managing teams but just the thought of being in charge of others now leaves you feeling drained.

If an older worker is seeking a position with a company, they can highlight their “motivated skills” on their resumes. Peila-Shuster then suggests looking to see if one’s motivated skills match the job description. “Obviously, no job is perfect, but isn’t it better to reach for the best match possible and scale down as needed?”

The same process applies if you are looking to start a business, work as a contractor, or contribute in some other manner. Peila-Shuster advocates knowing your strengths and what you want to offer. And then you can figure out where to use those skills and strengths to make a difference.

We all know boomers who are struggling to find work. And we also hear stories of older workers who have spun second or third careers into new and exciting ventures.

Beyond working to our motivated skills and strengths, Peila-Shuster also suggests further self-reflection to identify how we want the next chapter to look and how we want to matter in the world.

In what ways can we continue to use our passions to make a difference? How much money do we need to earn? What kind of schedule do we envision for ourselves?

Our “life work” can then be carried out in multiple ways such as paid work, volunteering, and contributing to family and friends.

Peila-Shuster stresses, “Human development is a life-long process. People have much to offer the world around them at any stage of life.”

Many older workers assume that they must downsize their careers. Peila-Shuster counters that, "it is not about downsizing anything." That is negative language that keeps us stuck in an outdated paradigm about work and retirement. Instead, "it is about right-sizing our lives to make sense for our current needs and wants," she says.

Age is not simply a number. It is a state of mind. In many respects it is what we think about aging that determines how positive and energized we feel about our lives and growing older. According to Peila-Shuster, "If we encourage people to define this time of their lives according to their needs, desires, and life context, then the pressure associated with 'living the good life' in retirement can begin to be lifted."

It is important to note that writing a new chapter is rarely easy. Job-searching in today's market is challenging and transitioning to a brand-new career can be even trickier. But let's remember that baby boomers are not known to shy away from challenges.

Freedman believes that, "boomers are being called upon to change the shape of their own futures and also the future of generations to come. They are redefining what it means to grow old and remain productive." It seems important to stress the incredible value that boomers bring to the workplace and to the world. Many older workers tend to forget their worth.

When we free our minds from outdated ideas that we

assistant professor, counseling and career development are too old to contribute or that it is too late to embark on a new career, we open up to what is next.

So, what is next? The details will vary from person to person, but there will be a common theme. Most of us will live longer and continue working in some fashion long into our golden years. Welcome to the new normal.

How ready are you?

We asked five boomers what they've done to prepare for retirement and what's they're expecting in the years ahead. The answers, happily, are generally positive, at least for this group.

Donna Sigward

Age: 59

Location: Cheyenne, Wyo.

Occupation: I am a licensed clinical social worker at Peak Wellness Center, a community mental health agency. I am a clinical supervisor and early-childhood family therapist.

Hometown: Born in Torrington, Wyo. and graduated from high school in Ainsworth, Neb. Graduated with a master's degree from University of Wyoming in 2004.

Marital status: Married 39 1/2 years.

Retirement age/date: I haven't set a date or age. I like my work.

Retirement plan: I fully fund an IRA every year, contribute to a 401(k) at work, have a Roth IRA, am paying down mortgage as much as possible and have rental property.

What would you have done differently? I wish I had gone to college 20 years before I did, as this has made the greatest difference in my ability to fund our IRAs. My spouse has been totally disabled after an industrial accident in 1981.

Bill May

Age: 62

Location: I live on 80 acres outside of Briggsdale, Colo.

Occupation: I was a business marketing teacher and football and baseball coach at the high school level before I retired after 30 years.

Hometown: I have lived in the Greeley area since 1968. I grew up in Lakewood, Colo.

Marital status: Married.

Retirement age/date: I retired in 2001.

Retirement Plan: I saved and am covered by PERA retirement.

What would you have done differently? I wouldn't do anything different.

Jim Angell

Age: 54

Location: Cheyenne, Wyo.

Occupation: Executive director, Wyoming Press Association.

Hometown: Walla Walla, Wash.

Marital status: Married

Retirement age/date: 2023

Retirement Plans: I have been investing in an annual retirement benefit provided by my company in a retirement plan. Also, I am vested in a pension from a previous employer and have purchased part ownership in a family farm that provides an ongoing revenue stream.

What would you have done differently? I would put more of my take-home pay into a retirement account. And I would have made sure that the money came off the "top" of the paycheck. Otherwise, it seems like there's nothing left to invest at the end of the month. I hope to improve in that area in the coming years.

Betty Artez

Age: 57

Location: I have lived in Lafayette for the past four years but am moving to Louisville to be closer to work. Also downsizing!

Occupation: I am the co-owner of Casa Alvarez Restaurant in Boulder, Colo.

Hometown: That is a difficult question. I was born in Buenos Aires, Argentina, and moved to the United States in 1962 when I was seven years old. We lived in New York City for the next 22 years, and I considered myself a staunch New Yorker. I moved to Boulder in 1984 when my son was 6-months-old and have lived here ever since. So I have lived in Boulder the longest and feel invested in the community so will say that Boulder is my hometown.

Marital status: Divorced.

Retirement age/date: I don't think I will ever really retire. I enjoy my work and am branching out to other areas of the food industry, packaging and selling our sauces in retail stores. I think that in a couple of years I will try to wind down the day-to-day restaurant part of my career to enjoy more free time, to possibly do more community volunteer work and some travel.

Retirement plans: My financial planning has always been focused on real estate and my business. I have done well in those two areas and continue to invest in those areas. I purchased a property in Taos, N.M., with the idea that someday I would move there but currently I use it as my getaway and retreat center.

What would you have done differently: I am pretty happy with how things are turning out. We have been affected by the various downturns over the past 18 years that we have been in business but have learned to adjust to the changes in the economic climate. Happily, I did not invest in the stock market so was not affected by the decline in value as others were.

Gary Burton

Age: 68

Location: My wife Liz and I live at Seeley Lake north of Greeley. We moved here six years ago from Arvada.

Occupation: I retired from PepsiCo eight years ago after working for the same company for 41 years. I retired at age 59. I was the director of sales for the last 24 years of my career. My wife Liz owns her own business – Professional Background Investigations Inc. She does pre-employment screening for businesses. She is not planning on retiring anytime soon. She is 65.

Hometown: I was originally from Haxtun, Colo., and Liz is from Gothenburg, Neb. However, I moved and lived in the Denver and Arvada area from the age of eight.

Retirement Plans: My retirement went smoothly and I set up an account with a local financial management company. All went well until the market collapse in 2008. Then we, like many other retired people, suffered some pretty significant losses out of our retirement. I changed financial managers after that experience to go with someone with a better plan on what to do when there is trouble in the market. Three years ago I started volunteering for Weld County United Way. I worked on the volunteer Cabinet in Denver for the Mile High Campaign during the 1990s, so I already had a big appreciation for all of the good that United Way does in the community. I am now the campaign chairperson for the Weld County Cabinet and serve on their board of directors. I think that retired business executives make great volunteers in the community.

HOSPICECARE OF BOULDER AND BROOMFIELD COUNTIES

A Legacy of Caring, Compassion, and Choice

Founded in 1976 as Colorado's first and our community's only non-profit hospice, HospiceCare has a long history of providing expert, compassionate care to those who are terminally ill and their families. Much has changed over the years, but our commitment to those who are facing end-of-life issues has never wavered. Because we have never lost sight of the reason we're here: to care for the community that founded, shapes, and supports us.

The organization first began programming in 1969 as part of the Boulder Valley YMCA, and was incorporated as a private, non-profit corporation in 1989 to address local needs in Longmont. Youth development, health and wellness have been the core program activities since the beginning. Since 2009, the YMCA has initiated programs to focus on three under-served populations with a goal of increasing diversity and inclusion: health seekers, the Hispanic/Latino community, and people living in poverty.
