Accidents sharpen oil, gas industry's focus on safety

By Dallas Heltzell
news@bizwest.com

As burgeoning development along the Front Range creeps ever closer to oil and gas drilling areas on the high plains, the debate between residents and the extraction industry has focused on safety.

That focus never was sharper than this spring, when a trio of Weld County accidents — two of them deadly — triggered a wave of outrage and introspection that has ripples far beyond Colorado's borders.

On April 17, an explosion at a home in Firestone killed two brothers-in-law, left one of the men's wives in critical condition and also injured their 11-year-old son. An inspection by the Frederick-Firestone Fire Protection District determined that an abandoned, severed gas flowline that still was connected to a nearby oil and gas well owned by Anadarko Petroleum Corp. triggered the blast when the cut line let gases seep into the home's basement through drains and a sump pit.

On May 25, a Greeley man died and three other workers were injured in an oil tank fire at the Sekich Tank Battery near Mead. The crew of sub-contractors was doing maintenance on an Anadarko "battery" — a grouping of oil tanks — when the blaze was sparked.

On June 27, an oil tank operated by Anadarko near its Erie Commons well site leaked about 5,040 gallons of oil — equivalent to about 120 barrels — into the ground but contained in a berm structure surrounding the tank. A study by the Colorado Oil and Gas Conservation Commission blamed the leak on a pin hole in the back of one of the tanks.

For an industry already battered by battles at the polls, in the media and in the courts, the incidents meant even more scrutiny — both external and internal.

Following the Firestone home explosion, Anadarko voluntarily shut down 3,000 similar wells around the state that accounted for 13,000 net barrels of production each day, Erie's Board of Trustees expanded the number of wells slated for additional air-quality monitoring and considered requiring oil and gas operators to map their pipelines through the town, and Boulder County commissioners moved to impose some of the state's strictest regulations on drillers in unincorporated parts of the county.

Gov. John Hickenlooper — who in an interview with the Inside Energy website said he was amazed "that housing has come that close to wells and that wells have been drilled that close to housing" — ordered a state-wide review of all oil and gas operations.

COGCC subsequently ordered every oil and gas company operating in the state to test all flowlines within 1,000 feet of a building by the end of June.

According to an Inside Energy analysis, between 2010 and 2015, the number of people in Colorado who live in areas with at least one well per square kilometer increased by about 50,000. As of April, Colorado had 53,322 active oil and gas wells, nearly half of which were located in Weld County.

A report from the Colorado School of Public Health cited 116 fires and explosions related to energy development in the state between 2006 and 2015, and an Inside Energy analysis found 20 more in 2016 and 2017.

Boulder, Longmont, Broomfield and Fort Collins, either through ordinances or ballot initiatives, had tried to constrain oil and gas development — especially those projects employing hydraulic fracturing — but those attempts at local control were struck down by Colorado's courts. Loveland voters rejected a similar move.

At least in Broomfield, this spring's incidents have brought the conflict back to the polls. Some residents there launched a recall effort against Mayor Pro-Tem Greg Stokes, claiming he's too close to the oil and gas industry. That recall drive reportedly drew the attention of an opposition-research firm run by a former aide to 2012 Republican presidential nominee Mitt Romney. Meanwhile, Extraction Oil and Gas, which initially planned 141 wells near residential areas and schools inside Broomfield's limits, decided to move 40 of those wells outside the city and into unincorporated Adams County.

Erie has considered a novel approach to restoring some local control. In July, officials debated amending the town's "public health and safety" code to empower police to investigate complaints against oil and gas odors and issue tickets or summonses to offending companies.

In Lafayette, tension over the safety issue even led to a proposed ordinance that basically would have legalized civil disobedience to stop fracking operations. The home explosion in April magnified the conversation there — as well as in the pages of a Boulder newspaper, which ran a letter to the editor from a man who opined that residents of neighborhoods impacted by fracking might have a "moral responsibility to blow up wells."

The fatal Firestone blast also focused industry and government officials alike on the issues of setbacks and flowlines.

COGCC requires new drilling to be kept at least 500 feet away from houses, but Erie Mayor Pro-Tem Mark Gruber has contended that neither the state nor the industry has proved that the 500-foot setback is safe and residents testifying at city meetings have said the impacts of drilling reach much farther.

Moreover, no statewide rules govern "reverse setbacks," the distance that new homes must be built from older wells, because COGCC regulates the oil and gas industry, not home-builders or developers. Those setbacks are set by municipalities and very widely — from 750 feet in Longmont down to 350 feet in Louisville and Lafayette, 200 feet in Frederick and Broomfield, and as little as 150 feet in Dacono and Firestone. The house that was destroyed by the explosion in Firestone was 178 feet from the well blamed for the blast.

An analysis by Inside Energy of spill data provided by COGCC found that at least 289 of the more than 1,652 spills related to oil and gas development in the state in the past three years have been linked to flowlines, pipes generally 1 to 2 inches in diameter that connect wells to tanks or other collection points.

The results of the inspections ordered by COGCC were encouraging for the industry. Anadarko reported that 99.6 percent of the 4,000 flowlines it tested passed inspection. Noble Energy saw 99.5 percent of the more than 3,300 flow lines it tested earn passing grades, 99.7 percent of the 1,500 flowlines PDC Energy tested got a green light, and Extraction Oil and Gas tested 2,091 lines and reported a 99.3 percent pass rate.

The state's industry lobbying group, the Colorado Oil and Gas Association, supported the state-mandated flowline inspections. In a statement, COGA pledged that, "in the weeks and months that follow, we will endeavor to enhance flowline and pipeline procedures and remain committed to improving Colorado oil and gas production."

COGCC hasn't yet decided on any future actions or regulations based on the data, but some extraction companies aren't waiting, shutting down older vertical oil and gas wells they say are at the root of the flowline issue. The companies say today's horizontal drilling is more efficient and presents less risk of the type of flowline leak linked to the Firestone house explosion.

Anadarko, which could face several class-action lawsuits over the explosion, reportedly is providing money for homeowners to purchase home natural-gas detection devices. Most natural gas contains an additive called mercaptan that gives the otherwise odorless gas a rotten-egg smell so that leaks can be detected, but the gas that seeped into the Firestone subdivision was unprocessed and thus didn't contain the odor additive.

Al Walker, Anadarko's chairman, president and chief executive.

"The safety of our employees and the people who live and work in the communities in which we operate is our number one priority," Al Walker, Anadarko's chairman, president and chief executive, told BizWest in April. In a prepared statement, Brad Holly, Anadarko's senior vice president for U.S. onshore exploration and production, added that "Colorado residents must feel safe in their own homes."

Continuing shockwaves from the Weld County incidents are likely to make one particular session in an upcoming energy summit even more interesting. The schedule for the Aug. 22-24 summit in Denver includes a "fireside chat" entitled, "The Progression of Safety: From Process to Culture."

Energy Logic makes its own luck

By Tommy Wood

JOEL BLOCKER / FOR BIZWEST

Trevor Donnelly, an energy rater for EnergyLogic, shows off his manometer reading after he performed a duct system test at an Energy Star home in north Fort Collins in April 2017. Donnelly's main goal is to quantify duct leakage so the HVAC system is up to compliance for Energy Star rating.

BERTHOUD — It was the early 1990s, and Steve Byers needed to figure out what to do with his life. The U.S. Air Force Academy, typically, puts its graduates on a fairly determined career track. But Byers, having majored in history, graduated in 1987 and completed his service, was qualified only to do the one thing he no longer wanted to do — fly.

He'd always been interested in the alternative-energy industry, though, and even if it was “dead” at the time, as Byers said, it was an option. Without knowing it'd change the course of his life and his career, Byers found a nonprofit in Atlanta that specialized in inspections and alternative building techniques.

He begged them for an internship, then a job, and all the while, he fell in love. Byers spun his passion into a business, EnergyLogic Corp., in 2006, again with no idea of where it would take him. Eleven years later, the Berthoud-based company is one of the fastest-growing in the region, employs 54 people and posted about $4 million in revenue in 2016.

“We're in a rather different place now,” is how Byers modestly described EnergyLogic's growth.

The company initially offered its services to homebuilders as a Home Efficiency Rating System evaluator, which is the construction-industry standard for energy efficiency in a home.

HERS is an index ranging from zero to 150, with zero meaning that a house produces as much energy as it consumes. The standard for an average new house is 100; for the typical house on the resale market, it's 130. The average new home, therefore, is 30 percent more energy-efficient than the average one on the resale market.

Byers started EnergyLogic with his wife and a business partner whom he had met in his days working for a nonprofit. They settled their company in Berthoud for several reasons, primarily because Byers' wife is from there and they wanted to be closer to family. Byers grew up an Army brat and spent some of his childhood in Colorado Springs; he loved the state, too.

They also saw opportunity there. The population of the Colorado Front Range, 5.4 million people as of the 2010 census, is projected to grow by 87 percent by 2050. Those people will need places to live, their dwellings will need energy inspection, and they will be living in one of the most environmentally conscious states. It seemed like the perfect place in which to start EnergyLogic.

At the time, Byers knew nothing about business, and the idea of learning wasn't particularly appealing to him. The more he did it, though — and you may be sensing a theme here — Byers came to love the minutiae of running a business. EnergyLogic soon grew beyond his expectations.

JOEL BLOCKER / FOR BIZWEST
Steve Byers, principal and CEO for EnergyLogic, founded the Berthoud-based company in 2006 along with his wife, Wynne Maggi, and Robby Schwarz.

Byers thought the company was big when it hit 10 employees. Twenty, maybe, was its upper limit. Then it grew to 30, to 40, to the 54 it employs now. Byers' new target is 100. EnergyLogic grew so quickly that his wife had to quit her job as a professor at the University of Colorado to manage the company's books full-time.

Perhaps most striking is that the recession hit during the company's infancy, but EnergyLogic grew through it. In Byers' words, it “made its own luck.” It diversified beyond builder services and home inspections.

EnergyLogic started offering other industry-specific services that weren't limited to its original mission. It trains engineers and other energy-industry professionals, offering certifications in HERS and other industry standards, both in person and online.

It developed its own data-management software, called DASH, for performing energy inspections. EnergyLogic constantly iterates upon DASH during its own inspections before it passes on updates to its clients. In 2013, 10 percent of all HERS ratings were processed using DASH. It also started offering LEED and Energy Star certifications.

“Diversification allows us to be responsive to the market, be nimble and respond to client needs,” Byers said.

That allowed EnergyLogic to grow evolutionarily and stay within itself, rather than expand rapidly. Byers doesn’t believe in “aha” moments. He treasures the process of growth as much as the result itself. That said, he is a perfectionist who runs a company full of them. EnergyLogic doesn’t adhere to HERS standards, but strives to exceed them.

“Those standards are the minimum,” Byers said. “If you want to be stellar, you have to exceed it. If your standard is above the minimum, everyone is held to that. It’s a low bar to clear.”

To that end, EnergyLogic created a companywide standard by interviewing and studying their best employees, trying to reverse-engineer the traits that made them great. Management then focus-grouped with its entire staff, picking their brains on these characteristics to distill them into a set of values.

They came up with five, matched to the first letters of the alphabet. All for one and one for all, because “the whole of our team is greater than the sum of its parts.” Build a better mousetrap, because EnergyLogic tries to “find creative solutions to the challenges we face.” Chase perfection, because “you’re either chasing perfection or you’re not.” Do the right thing, “even when it’s hard.” Energy— of course — because the company “brings it, and we save it.”

EnergyLogic’s revenues are projected to grow by about $1 million in 2017, to just shy of $5 million. Byers said the company will exceed that if things go well. Meanwhile, the formerly listless veteran will keep living his charmed life — Byers is his own boss; he works with his wife every day; he stumbled upon his greatest passions and found a way to monetize them. When he talks about it, he barely seems to believe it:

“How many times can anyone get that lucky?”

When we work together, so much more becomes possible.

At Noble Energy, we’re keeping our commitment to Colorado’s communities and working hard everyday to live up to our name.

We are proud to be a part of the BizWest Energy Summit and to explore how energy development is transforming the economy in Weld and throughout Colorado.

Tallgrass Energy plans new oil terminal in Platteville

By BizWest Staff
news@bizwest.com

Kansas energy company Tallgrass Energy Partners LP (NYSE: TEP) will develop a new oil terminal in Platteville, in partnership with Saddle Butte Pipeline.

The Tallgrass Grasslands oil terminal complex will be developed through the Leawood, Kan.-based company's subsidiaries, Tallgrass Pony Express Pipeline LLC and Tallgrass Terminals LLC, the company announced.

The terminal will be located in the Platteville oil terminal complex and will interconnect with Saddle Butte's Denver-Julesburg Basin crude oil gathering system.

Tallgrass said the Platteville Extension "is expected to have an ultimate takeaway capacity of at least 80,000 barrels of crude oil per day and is expected to be in service Q2 2018."

"The proposed Platteville Extension and Tallgrass Grasslands Terminal, together with our existing Buckingham Terminal and Northeast Colorado Lateral, give Pony Express and Tallgrass Terminals an unrivaled footprint in the D-J and provide meaningful benefits to producers," said Doug Johnson, vice president and general manager of Tallgrass Pony Express Pipeline, in a prepared statement.

Clean Chemistry receives patents for water-treatment processes

By Doug Storum
dstorum@bizwest.com

BOULDER— Clean Chemistry, a Boulder-based chemical tech firm, on Tuesday said it has received three patents from the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office that covers its production processes for treating water.

PeroxyMax, one of the chemistries covered under the patents, can treat water for re-use in hydraulic fracturing. It enables separations in recovered fluids, floating oil and dropping solids in a more efficient manner than more dangerous and corrosive alternatives on the market like chlorine dioxide, the company said in a prepared statement.

“These patents protect our investment in developing economic chlorine alternatives for difficult, industrial problems,” said Damon Waters, Clean Chemistry’s chief executive and co-founder.

Clean Chemistry has commercialized the ROS technology in the oil and gas industry. It also is starting to engage other markets with various challenging water re-use, oxidation and disinfection problems. The patents cover the use of large scale quantities of reactive oxygen species in liquid forms.

“Reactive oxygen species are highly reactive, short-lived forms of oxygen that react quickly with target contaminants leaving benign residuals” said Wayne Buschmann, Clean Chemistry’s chief technology officer and co-founder. “Providing ROS in a liquid concentrate is a significant market opportunity and these patents cover a range of compositions providing a platform for the next generation of oxidants and disinfectants.”

Founded in 2012, Clean Chemistry opened a field office this month in Odessa, Texas.

The patents for inventions numbered 9,551,076 , 9,517,955 and 9,517,956.
