Outdoor industry drives Colorado's economy

Colorado's outdoor industry takes many forms, from rafting companies to outfitters, backpack manufacturers to ski resorts, flashlight companies to sporting events. The industry is diverse and represents a key element of the Colorado economy.

The state ranks No. 1 in the country for overnight ski visits, and No. 8 nationwide for outdoor overnight trips, according to the Colorado Outdoor Recreation Industry Office.

But that's not all. The Outdoor Industry Association, a national trade group based in Boulder, estimates that the outdoor industry generates $13.2 billion in consumer spending in Colorado, producing $4.2 billion in annual wages and salaries and $994 million in state and local tax revenue. The sector employs 125,000 people in the state.

Many of those employees work in the ski industry, at rafting companies and outfitters, at bicycle shops or other businesses directly involved in outdoor recreation. But an increasing number work at companies, large and small, that create and produce innovative products geared toward the outdoor enthusiast.

product for their outdoor lives need look no farther than Otter Products LLC in Fort Collins, which makes rugged phone cases; Honey Stinger in Steamboat Springs for honey-based energy foods; Crocs Inc. in Niwot for casual footwear; or Trek Light Gear in Boulder for hammocks.

The list goes on and on, in communities deep in the Colorado Rockies or out on the eastern plains. The size of that list is one reason that BizWest Media LLC — based in Boulder and Fort Collins and publishers of BizWest, a regional business journal — decided to produce the Colorado Outdoor Industry Directory, the first such attempt to identify the key players of the state's outdoor economy.

We were joined in the effort by the Colorado Outdoor Recreation Industry Office, a year-old office within the Colorado Office of Economic Development and International Trade. We'd like to thank Luis Benitez, director of the office, and his team for their support in this endeavor.

Also helping immensely was the Boulder-based PeopleForBikes Coalition, which provided extensive data on the state's bicycle industry. The directory is more complete, thanks to their contribution.

While we are grateful to the PeopleForBikes Coalition and the Colorado Outdoor Recreation Industry Office, we should note that any errors or omissions in the directory are ours alone. With any research endeavor — especially a first-time effort — errors and omissions are likely. If we left your company out of the directory, or if your listing requires updating, please contact Christopher Wood at cwood@bizwestmedia.com, and we'll update our records.

Thanks finally to Catherine Wood, who helped research the directory.

The Outdoor Recreation Industry

It's easy in this era of consumption to define these three words in simple terms. The latest and greatest gear for the outdoors, adrenaline filled sports, and global iconic vistas are the norm. We in Colorado believe in something different, something stronger. Within these pages you will find the 1st ever collection of Colorado outdoor industry companies and non profits. This is an effort to show that in Colorado we not only believe in the power of the industry and its athletic pursuits, but also in the leadership our industry can provide when it comes to health and wellness, conservation and stewardship, robust economic development, and even education.

The listings within these pages are to highlight how diverse we are as a state in this industry, but also to ensure that our network remains connected and strong. As this book is a work in progress, we expect subsequent issues will include more details, more companies, and more non-profits, so please share with us who else should be included. Utilize this information, pick up the phone, send an email, and find ways to collaborate that have never been thought of before. By doing so, our greatest hope is that our community continues to drive innovation within our industry, sparking interesting conversations about collaboration, and continually reinforcing that we are much stronger together, than we are apart.

Everyone in Colorado knows why people from other states continue to move here. The area is an outdoor enthusiast's dream, with lots of hiking and biking trails, places to mountain climb or boulder, many areas for water sports, camping and fishing. But how did Colorado become one of the major outdoor industry hubs in the country?

It all started during World War II, said Gary Gomulinski, senior vice president for commercial banking at Citywide Banks in Boulder and a member of Active Boulder, a group that fosters cooperation among gear companies, innovators and retailers in the outdoor industry.

The military established a winter and mountain warfare training facility at Camp Hale in west-central Colorado in 1942. The area was perfect for training soldiers how to ski, rock climb and survive in all types of weather conditions. It was this type of training that drove innovation in the outdoor gear and materials arenas. The military developed new fabrics, such as lightweight nylon, and aluminum to make a soldier's pack less of a burden.

Soldiers who trained at Camp Hale with the Army's 10th Mountain Division enjoyed skiing and camping, and when the war was over, many of them stayed in the state. They wanted to continue participating in the outdoor activities they grew to love during their training, such as Nordic and downhill skiing, camping and rock climbing, and they started companies to promote outdoor recreation.

Boulder, Boston and Berkeley were the top three areas where the outdoor industry was born. In Boulder, companies such as Gerry, Holubar, Frostline and Alp Sports anchored the outdoor industry. In Boston, EMS and LL Bean reigned supreme; and Berkeley, Calif., saw the founding of some of the biggest outdoor companies in the country, including Patagonia, Royal Robbins, North Face, Ski Hut and Sierra Designs, Gomulinski said.

At least in Boulder, the founders of these big-name companies had ties to the military, Gomulinski said. One of the industry's forefathers, Gerry Cunningham, founded Gerry Mountaineering in 1946. He served in the 10th Mountain Division and realized that there was a need for better outdoor equipment. He started his business designing and manufacturing versatile and lightweight mountaineering gear.

Cunningham started with rucksacks and climbing packs. He is credited with designing everything from the modern carabiner, in use today in mountain climbing, to the Cordlock, a drawstring clamp still used to quickly close a rucksack, seal a sleeping bag cover or tighten the waist of a lightweight rain jacket.

Today, Colorado continues to attract modern outdoor companies. They come here for the same reasons we came here, Gomulinski said, "being close to the mountains so you can get out and play on weekends."

He added that, "it is pretty impressive to see the companies that come here and part of it is if you locate your company somewhere near where people want to quickly get out and play, then you're going to find the employees that best represent your brand and get out and use your product."

Because of Boulder's robust technology sector, many of the companies that have started here or moved here have an outdoor-industry technology focus. The natural-foods industry is an offshoot of the outdoor industry, as is the booming outdoor apparel market.

The presence of the University of Colorado in Boulder also has made an impact on the success of the outdoor industry in the state, said Clif Harald, executive director of the Boulder Economic Council, which is part of the Boulder Chamber.

"You cannot talk about anything in Boulder's economy or different industries without acknowledging the role of CU in attracting people that are open to new ideas," Harald said. Many wanted to attend

"One of the big concerns for companies in this industry is the continued access to wild places that we like to play and recreate in. We want to make sure local, county and state governments know we are here and all the good we do."

Clif Harald,
executive director of the Boulder Economic Council

college but still be able to participate in numerous outdoor sports.

The Boulder Economic Council supports the outdoor industry in the area as much as possible.

"Boulder, in particular, is in a position to really thrive based on the companies we have already, so our top priority is to support the businesses that are here today and do everything we can to continue making sure Boulder is the best community possible for their businesses," Harald said. "We do get contacted by companies across many different industries, including outdoor. When we are contacted by them, we will provide all the information and support possible to help them make a decision to relocate here."

The outdoor industry has gotten more competitive as states, cities and municipalities realize that outdoor recreation is a huge economic driver. The industry no longer is just flooded with U.S.-based companies but with international competitors as well.

"Some businesses can be very successful selling products and services to a very localized market, to Colorado or the Western U.S., but increasingly those businesses are seeing competition from other businesses around the world," Harald said.

Another challenge is keeping up with advancements in the industry. Someone always is coming out with new outerwear, backpacks or technical gear.

"It requires a lot of new product development to keep current with both fashion trends and the technical requirements that outdoor enthusiasts have," Harald said. "That requires capital and continuous investment and continuous marketing campaigns and sales campaigns. That's a challenge at a fairly high level."

The Front Range continues to boom economically, which poses other challenges. The unemployment rate is very low, and it is becoming much more difficult to recruit and retain employees in the area.

The costs of doing business also go up in a booming economy. It becomes harder to find office and warehouse space — or, if there is space, it is very expensive, he said.

Active Boulder has been around since about 2005 but really gained strength after the Colorado floods in 2013. The flood destroyed trails and outdoor spaces around Boulder and the group wanted to do something about it. The group hosts industry networking events to get people talking to one another to hopefully inspire the next great thing in the outdoor industry, Gomulinski said. Active Boulder also is big on advocacy.

"One of the big concerns for companies in this industry is the continued access to wild places that we like to play and recreate in," he said. "We want to make sure local, county and state governments know we are here and all the good we do."

Active Boulder also is very service-oriented. Each year it coordinates a big volunteer service project, usually focused on trail building or restoration.

"The best thing we can do as an organization is continue to raise awareness of all those companies and all the innovation happening in this area," Gomulinski said. "By doing that, maybe we will encourage the next outdoor company startup."

Outdoor startups embrace small Colorado towns

BY JEFF THOMAS
news@bizwestmedia.com

Small mountain towns in Colorado are increasingly home to incubating manufacturing startups in the outdoor industry, and none seems to be doing a better job of it than Steamboat Springs.

While famous for being the home to more Winter Olympics athletes than any other in the nation, it also is home to an incredible assortment of outdoor manufacturers.

The town of about 12,000 residents is home to two bicycle manufacturers, three outdoor food manufacturers including nationally known Honey Stinger and PowerICE, two riverboat manufacturers — one of which also produces fly-fishing accessories, two outdoor apparel manufacturers, a locally sourced ski manufacturer, a pole manufacturer and, well, pretty much everything under the sun up to and including quick-drying dog collars and harnesses.

“I think that obviously we live in an incredible outdoor community. People here can test products, live the lifestyle, walk the walk and talk the talk,” said Maren McCutchan, the public relations official for the Steamboat Springs Chamber of Commerce. “This is also a really great place to live, with great school systems and health care.”

It’s also a place where obviously some thought has gone into helping outdoor manufacturers create and thrive. While other areas of Colorado also are catching up, it’s obvious that Steamboat has been working to support its outdoor industry for some time.

Economic-development director Jane Blackstone said considerable work has been done by the town to make it easier for all entrepreneurs to create and bring their products to market, including getting Steamboat included this year in the Colorado Enterprise Zone, which grants state income tax credits for businesses hiring in these locations. Perhaps more importantly, however, she said, the Yampa Valley En-

Entrepreneurship Center, created by the city and Colorado Mountain College, has given startups the technical resources to get over the hurdles of starting and building a business.

“We don’t have a huge budget to recruit companies, so our focus in economic development is largely in community development, giving businesses that are considering locating here resource connections,” she said. “The Entrepreneurship Center is a great resource for entrepreneurs who are here and need those technical support systems.”

Building businesses in ski towns often is far easier than in small mountain towns that might have once relied on mining or forest products, said Amy Roberts, executive director of the national Outdoor Industry Association in Boulder. She said towns such as Rifle, Fruita and Grand Junction have put themselves on the map for attracting such industries by supporting activities such as mountain biking and rock climbing.

“The Colorado Office of Economic Development did a survey (with outdoor manufacturers and retailers) on what are the hurdles to growing their operation (and) what are the functions of the state that are most helpful,” Roberts said. That report is forthcoming at a Colorado Outdoor Leadership meeting in September, but the state already is taking a lead role in pursuing the outdoor industry.

“I think the governor deciding to dedicate an office to the outdoor industry, like in aerospace or high tech, was a huge step forward,” Roberts said. She said that type of commitment has made it easier for communities and counties not normally at the top of tourist destinations to consider and move on embracing both tourism and associated industries.

Luis Benitez, director of the Colorado Office of Outdoor Recreation Industry that Gov. John Hickenlooper created, agreed.

“I think the importance of small towns understanding how valuable the (outdoor recreation) industry is at this juncture is vital to rural Colorado,” Benitez said. “Remember, many small towns define tourism as outdoor recreation. Now, think of the amenities and businesses needed to support that tourism network. Bike shops for bike trails, boat shops for river corridors, etc.

“Town Councils need to understand, like any other industry, other states pay attention to how regional (outdoor recreation) companies are treated. (Other communities) are not above cold calling and even recruiting these companies out of their towns to another state,” he said.

“It would be valuable for them to understand that co-share working space and makerspace is where the next great outdoor products typically come from,” Benitez said. “It is usually not from large established companies, so it is important to support that process as well.”

By and large, that message is beginning to resonate throughout the state. In Grand Junction, the recently-formed Grand Valley Outdoor Recreation Coalition promotes the area as rich in both recreation and business opportunity.

The coalition was founded by Sarah Shrader, one of the owners of Bonsai Development signs — the zip line manufacturer that recently spanned the Broadmoor’s Seven Falls area in Colorado Springs — but is combining efforts with businesses such as chairlift manufacturer Leitner Poma, a leading employer in the area; Mesa University; bike-part maker Mountain Racing Products; bike wheel maker DT Swiss, Loki Gear, and Innovative Textiles, a fishing-line manufacturer.

Although large is population and manufacturing resources, the Colorado Springs area is just getting started, said David Leinweber, owner of one of the state’s largest fly shops, Angler’s Covey, and founder of the Pikes Peak Outdoor Recreation Alliance.

“Our community tends to be so defense minded, they tend to forget about the other things,” Leinweber said. “So the biggest goal for us is putting this notion in the business community’s brain that the outdoor industry is just as significant.”

“We compete pretty well against any industry, and I think we’ve let other communities, such as Ogden, Utah, target the outdoor industry,” he said. “Setting up a new business and doing any kind of manufacturing in the Front Range is pretty high priced, and Colorado Springs is pretty affordable.

“And we have tons of water.”

But still, the measuring stick for smaller communities may remain Steamboat.

The Yampa Valley Entrepreneurship Center, although not exclusive to the outdoor industry, already includes coworking space — eight offices below market rates — and a maker center for startups to begin working on their products, said director Randy Rudasics. In addition, eight seasoned volunteer executives mentor business owners through the SCORE program.

There always will be challenges for some businesses to face as they grow, Rudasics said, especially the cost of transporting heavy products, such as skis, but he said the sheer remoteness of the area often reinforces the entrepreneurial spirit.

“There’s not a lot of big businesses here, so you’ve got to create your own,” he said. “People who are attracted to this place and love the outdoors often have to create their own way.”

Manufacturers picky about where they make camp

news@bizwestmedia.com

We all have reasons — sometimes leaking into rationalization — for being where we are. But whether it's love, location or incredible luck or lucidity, here are some of our favorite reasons for outdoor manufacturers to be where they are in Colorado — which, of course is always a good place to continue to be, or be from, or perhaps going to.

Southern Colorado: Voormi, because it wasn't Boulder

A principal reason that Voormi — perhaps the most innovative name in outdoor apparel today — is in Pagosa Springs is the fact that this small southern mountain town on the western side of Wolf Creek Pass is NOT Boulder.

Marketing director Timm Smith said that founder Dan English was in Boulder about seven years ago when the former software engineer decided that creating an outdoor apparel company just wouldn't work there.

"The goal in getting to Pagosa Springs was to really step out of that scene," Smith said. "Each company was affecting each other so much that they all ended up with the same product.

"Sometimes to get a different perspective you've got to get out of your own skin."

Apparently that was successful, and it may turn out to be one of the most successful ideas regarding what we put next to our skins, as well. Voormi, which has about 15 employees in Pagosa, has a unique "engineered fabric construction process" that combines wool with water-proof and wicking polymers during the weave. The result is light and flexible apparel that can range from sturdy shirts to semi-waterproof fleece with wool fabrics that intertwine water-resistant synthetics on the outside and water-wicking synthetics on the inside; think about a sweatshirt hoodie you can wear on the water while fly fishing.

Voormi gets all its wool from the Rocky Mountains, with finer wool fibers from northern New Mexico, but its business philosophy was honed in Boulder high tech. "It was very much a Silicon Valley model," Smith said, "not knowing how we were going to do it, but knowing it all had to be disruptive."

Small sew shops around Colorado are networked together with designers to create an extremely agile manufacturing environment that partners with local suppliers to create a rapid iteration process to meet changing demand. Try to find that anywhere else in the apparel world.

English first began work in Pagosa with textile expert Doug Lumb in 2010. From there it may be history in the making as the product has received rave reviews from industry pundits such as Outside and Backpacker magazines.

But the real secret? Hanging with real-world people who don't have a lot of money and use their gear in a variety of occupations and circumstance: from the top of Wolf Creek during the winter, to the rafting season during the spring, creeks during fly-fishing season and hunting in the fall.

"We have to sit down and drink beer with these people," Smith said.

Fishpond of Denver: Because timing is everything

Fishpond provides some very differentiated fly-fishing gear for men and women anglers, an eclectic group of fishing vests, chest packs, tech packs, bags and apparel. Originally located in Denver and Kansas, it consolidated the Fishpond (men's) and Lilypond (women's) brand headquarters in Colorado about five years ago, just in the nick of time before prices started soaring. The company keeps its seven-person management team in Denver today.

"We decided on Denver because of its central location," said founder Ben Kurtz. "Being in a city such as Denver, we have the ability to attract and retain talent from all over the country. Denver gives us the ability to also tap into many other resources and partners that we might otherwise not be able to take advantage of."

But perhaps more importantly, "Both the commercial and residential real estate markets were compelling at the time as well."

Talk about timing. A few more months and they would have been out of luck.

Denver: Because Topo is more than just lines on a map

Face it, there just aren't too many places in this world where you can go from urban to trail more quickly than along the Front Range, which is a darn good reason that Topo Designs is headquartered in Denver.

The company focuses on backpacks and apparel that easily can accommodate the transition from urban to trail, said marketing manager Becky Day. Founded in 2008 by friends Mark Hansen and Jedd

Rose, the company boasts 26 full-time employees, including retail store managers in Denver, Boulder, Fort Collins and San Francisco.

Most of the backpacks are made locally, while most of the apparel is manufactured in California. The founders were outdoorsmen who became acquainted at a previous job, but both still embrace the founding mantra of the company — for Hansen, biking to work in Denver, and for Rose, maintaining a Fort Collins office where he can quickly go from management to fly fishing.

"They pretty much founded the company to make products that are durable and usable," Day said. "They found they had the resources to build them locally, and we're lucky we're able to work within our community to make these products."

OtterBox: Because family focus thrives in Fort Collins

OtterBox is known throughout the world as the top protection case for smartphones and tablets, but few remember that the company was founded in 1998 as a drybox for kayakers.

"We started right here in (founder) Curt Richardson's garage," said communications manager Kristen Tatti. "The concept for the original was something you could keep your PDA safe in, but more and more people wanted something that would still allow them to manipulate it."

So the tough and waterproof membrane that allowed people to manipulate a personal digital assistant happened to be right on time for the mobile revolution. But if you check out the website at otterbox.com, you still can see videos of people slamming

Western Colorado: Because what happens in Cortez ought to stay in Cortez

Pinning down Osprey Packs founder Mike Pfothenauer isn't an easy task, so the city of Cortez has come up with an amazing land-for-jobs swap to do exactly that.

The company started in Santa Cruz, Calif., moved to Dolores in 1987 — just in time to rent a factory that was vacated by Gore-Tex — and for years hired nearby Navajo sewers. At the turn of the century, it moved headquarters to Cortez and manufacturing to Vietnam, which came hand-in-hand with moving distribution to Utah.

Cortez, on the other hand, apparently doesn't want Osprey to move on. The city came up with a remarkable plan to exchange a plat of land, worth about $245,000, for jobs — with each one coming with a salary in the mid-$30,000s — enabling the construction of a new company headquarters.

With hopes for 45 new jobs, the city will knock $5,000 off the purchase price for each new job that comes in.

"It's really a collaborative effort with the city in a number of ways," said Kami York-Feirn, the company's social media specialist. "They are helping us build a

$1.2 million headquarters, but we engage with the community in a number of ways, especially supporting our local schools, donating backpacks for back-to-school events."

The company currently has 44 employees in Vietnam and 85 in Cortez, where just about everyone hopes it continue to prosper.

Industry association: There's green in those green spaces

BY PAULA AVEN GLADYCH
news@bizwestmedia.com

The outdoor industry accounts for $646 billion in retail sales and services, $80 billion in federal, state and local tax revenues and 6.1 million American jobs, according to the Boulder-based Outdoor Industry Association.

The industry shows no sign of a slowdown.

Colorado established itself as a major outdoor-industry hub in the aftermath of World War II, with individuals piggybacking on the new technologies that were developed during the war and making them useful for the everyday consumer.

Founded 25 years ago, the Outdoor Industry Association has played a major role in bringing disparate outdoor-industry manufacturers and retailers together to present a more unified front when it comes to protecting America's outdoor recreation centers and promoting sustainable development.

Although the association is based in Boulder, with another office in Washington, D.C., it champions environmental causes across the country. It has 1,200 members nationwide ranging from large outdoor brands such as Patagonia, North Face and Columbia Sportswear to major retailers such as REI. It also represents small up-and-coming brands of outdoor apparel, equipment, skis, backpacks and fishing gear, focusing much of its efforts on specialty retail.

The group advocates for the industry in terms of fighting for more places for people to enjoy the outdoors, whether that means building additional infrastructure such as parks and trails throughout the country or maintaining wilderness areas or local parks.

"We're engaged at the federal level because the federal government manages national parks, Forest Service lands and BLM lands," said Amy Roberts, executive director of the OIA.

Amy Roberts serves as executive director of the Outdoor Industry Association, a Boulder-based trade group that represents more than 1,200 manufacturers, distributors, suppliers, sales representatives and retailers.

JONATHAN CASTNER FOR BIZWEST

A new program started by the organization deals with close-to-home recreation. The organization works with states, cities and counties to build recreation infrastructure locally, such as access to green spaces, parks and trails.

Another focus is on sustainable business practices. The group wants manufacturers to consider whether the way they are making products is sustainable and environmentally friendly.

The organization's presence has grown by leaps and bounds in the past decade, in part because the group made a concerted effort to help policymakers, such as members of Congress and mayors, to "understand outdoor recreation as an economic driver and job creator," Roberts said.

The group produced a report in 2008 showing all of the benefits to states, towns and local economies from outdoor recreation opportunities.

"Now it is seen as an economic driver as well as something that is beautiful or something people do with their free time. Investing in the outdoor-recreation economy brings jobs to the state you might want," she said, adding that those jobs aren't necessarily in the outdoor-recreation industry.

"We're a big part of the tourism economy but also part of why other businesses may locate to the state."

Companies in the technology or health-care fields are trying to attract employees, and location is a key determinant of where a company will set up shop.

The OIA's legislative arm wants to influence how lawmakers spend their scarce federal dollars, "making the argument that we maintain and preserve the nation's recreation investment and that there is economic return," Roberts said. "From a consumer standpoint, we as the outdoor-recreation industry want to make it easy for people to go outside and get involved in activity. We want to make sure they have access close to home and don't have to travel somewhere. They can incorporate it into their daily life."

There are numerous ways for people to spend their money and free time, she added. "We want to make sure that's something people consider."

The organization also encourages states to develop offices dedicated to their recreation. Utah was the first state to do that, followed closely by Colorado. Gov. John Hickenlooper established the Colorado Outdoor Recre-

"I think we will continue to innovate, and that drives interest in buying new products."

Amy Roberts,
executive director of the OIA.

ation Industry Office in 2015.

Colorado has a long history of an economy built on outdoor recreation in ski resort towns or the mountains. Now, cities that were almost totally reliant on the oil and gas and mining industries are realizing they have other natural resources they can develop to build their economy, she added — places such as Grand Junction, Fruita and Salida.

People have always moved to Colorado because of its natural amenities. They love to ski, climb mountains, hike, mountain bike, camp or fish. But having a state office dedicated to enhancing outdoor activities and development in the state "is putting some intention behind it instead of letting it naturally occur. We are seeing more intention behind that development," Roberts said.

Many large outdoor companies have made Colorado their home, including Coleman and Osprey Packs. As more outdoor manufacturers and retailers locate in the state, innovation follows. Paddle sports have become a huge industry in Colorado. With more people getting outside and doing fun activities, it also has driven the development of side industries such as breweries and taverns. The trend is called "trail to tavern," where people get their workout and then come back to civilization, eat dinner and have a beer.

Camping is another area that has grown in recent years with gear companies developing equipment and apparel that is targeted toward families; anything that would make it easier and more comfortable for families to get outside and enjoy the outdoors.

"Our industry put a big focus on product sustainability because that's where our biggest footprint is, in making materials," she said. OIA wants manufacturers to consider the products they are using to make their outdoor products, encouraging use of recycled and organic materials.

"The most durable product is probably the most sustainable," she said.

Even with more durable products, the industry continues to thrive. By working together, there has been a lot of product innovation. Gear is becoming lighter or offers new features.

"I think we will continue to innovate, and that drives interest in buying new products," she said.

Roberts said OIA will continue its efforts to protect the natural world, in large part because that's what voters want. In 2014 alone, voters approved $13 billion in funding for state and local parks, trails and green spaces. The great outdoors is a bipartisan issue, she said.

The founders of the association, she said, "came together and recognized we can have more influence and amplify the benefits of our industry by working together rather than individually as companies."
