PALAZZO

OUTDOOR GAS FIREPLACE

SEAMLESS CONTEMPORARY STYLE,
DESIGNED AND BUILT TO LIVE OUTDOORS.

The Palazzo is a new kind of outdoor fireplace – a linear design with a clean look that provides a contemporary focal point in an outdoor setting. This eye-catching fireplace is tough, built with marine grade stainless steel that is rust-resistant even in the harshest conditions. A tempered glass wind guard keeps the flames full and lively, while an industry-first Power Screen provides safety.

Brinkman construction and development teams at the groundbreaking of the Brinkman headquarters, Fuse on Harmony, in 2014.

COURTESY BRINKMAN PARTNERS

From a napkin sketch to more than 200 projects, Brinkman — and its employees — grow with region

If Kevin and Paul Brinkman had ended up in the right country many years ago, when Kevin was a civil engineering student studying abroad in Spain, they may never have founded the construction and real-estate company that bears their name, has built more than 200 projects along the Front Range and is developing almost 750,000 more square feet.

Paul, the elder by four years, had come to Spain to visit Kevin when the brothers bought Eurail passes — which allow non-Europeans to freely travel by train between 28 European countries — and boarded a train for France.

As the train sped them through the Spanish countryside, past undulating hills of green and golden brown, Paul and Kevin drifted off to sleep. They awoke in Italy.

Late nights in foreign countries are isolating and introspective, especially if you never intended to visit that country in the first place, but they also bring you closer to the people you're with. Those are the nights when you fix the world's problems, talk about life and imagine the future.

Kevin and Paul sketched their future out on a napkin while they waited for a train to take them back from Italy. They had always thought about going into business together; now they got serious, writing down the broad outlines of what would become their company, working through the night until they caught the next train.

"I wish we still had the napkin," Kevin said.

He and Paul realized their dream, and today are poised to grow it bigger than ever. Their company has spun out into Brinkman Colorado, which handles real-estate development, Brinkman Construction, which is self-explanatory, and Waypoint, a brokerage, consulting and investment firm.

Brinkman has also become 100 percent employee-owned through an employee stock ownership plan. The company wants to use "business as a force for good," as Kevin put it, erecting buildings that benefit the community and create a sense of place.

Kevin took a job in San Diego after he graduated from the University of Colorado Boulder with that civil engineering degree, but he and Paul never forgot about that napkin, or that night in Italy. They kept talking about it, and finally Paul visited, and they finalized their business plan on the beach.

Aged 25, Kevin moved back to Colorado, into his newlywed brother's house. Brinkman's first project was its own office, a thousand square feet that they designed and managed themselves.

Brinkman's first big project was a 4,500-square-foot building it built with the Fort Collins-based Everitt Cos. One building led to two, two to three. Brinkman and Everitt still have a working relationship. Kevin called that his company's big break.

"Give Everitt credit for having faith in us," he said.

The more Brinkman built, the more Kevin and Paul became fans of integrated design, where one company handles every step of the construction process, from securing the land to designing the building to actually building it to managing it post-construction.

"Integrated design is predictable," Kevin said, citing the Foundry, a project Brinkman is building in Loveland. "Design meetings have project managers, budget people, leasing agents. It's getting all that expertise together and building to budget.”

Integrated design also gives the designer more control over the project. In as high-risk a business as construction, reducing the variables you’re dealing with is invaluable.

It also raised issues, though, in that other real-estate brokers would see Brinkman as competition, even though brokerage was but one part of Brinkman’s business. Kevin said that some brokers wouldn’t work with other parts of Brinkman because of that. That was one of the primary reasons why Brinkman spun off its brokerage service into a separate entity, Waypoint, at the end of last year. The move allows Waypoint’s brokers to focus on third-party clients in addition to their in-house projects.

“No question within the first couple days, it’s made a difference,” Kevin said. “It helps open us up for more deal flow as a broker and a contractor.”

The other major change Brinkman underwent in the last year was its ESOP. Kevin and Paul had wanted the company to be employee-owned for some time; when Brinkman hit a “critical mass” of 100 employees, they thought it was the right time.

“It’s a tight labor market,” Kevin said. “There are less people in construction. We want to recruit and retain the best and brightest in the market.”

Using the ESOP, Kevin and Paul sold their 40 percent ownership shares, which were then divided amongst Brinkman’s employees. They didn’t have to buy in; they were given the shares.

“There’s a big difference in showing up as an owner instead of as an employee,” Kevin said.

Brinkman is scheduled to break ground in April on The Foundry, a massive development in downtown Loveland. These renderings are by the project architect, OZ Architecture. COURTESY BRINKMAN PARTNERS

Brinkman has a “no assholes” policy when it comes to its owners and business partners. Kevin said the company is in a position now to be more deliberate in the projects that it pursues, avoiding doing business with companies that don’t share its core values.

Brinkman has shifted its focus to projects that it thinks can benefit communities, rather than make it a quick buck. It’s adopted what Kevin called a “triple bottom line” that stipulates projects must have a positive social, environmental and economic impact.

He pointed to the Foundry, a development in downtown Loveland that will feature mixed-use retail space, apartments, a movie theatre, artists’ studios, condos and a parking garage, all arranged around a central, Old-Town-Fort-Collins-style town square.

Brinkman is also developing a similar project in Fort Collins, the 25,000-square-foot Harmony Commons on Harmony Road near the Hewlett-Packard plant. It will have mixed-use retail, dining and hotels around a central plaza.

Projects like these will help Brinkman become certified as a B Corporation, which is an independent review that signifies the company meets certain socially, environmentally and ethically conscious benchmarks.

“We’re walking the walk,” Kevin said.

And it’s working financially as well. Brinkman Construction topped $122 million in revenue in 2016, compared with $82 million two years prior.

It’s a long way from late-night train rides through foreign countries, from moving in with your newlywed brother, from that first thousand-square-foot office. Brinkman has grown to Kevin and Paul’s wildest dreams, and in the process they’ve brought the company full-circle, to a phase of giving back to the community that raised them, and their business.

“Being from here is a big help,” Kevin said. “The Front Range is one of the best real-estate markets in the country. We’re blessed to be born here.”

A building challenge

Contractors, home builders struggle with labor shortage

By Jeff Thomas
news@bizwest.com

Apparently, David Sinkey isn't averse to a bit of a challenge.

With about 12 different residential communities under construction in the northern Front Range, the CEO and president of Boulder Creek Neighborhoods figures on upping the number homes built this year from about 197 to about 240. This in the face of one of the most dramatic construction labor shortages Colorado has ever faced.

"We grow between 15 and 40 percent every year," said the head of a residential building firm that specializes in low-maintenance housing. "We're able to meet our quality and schedule expectations, though it takes more management and an extended schedule to get it done the way we want it done."

Across the board, residential and commercial builders alike are dealing with a severe construction labor shortage, which is most poignant in Colorado among skilled workers. Various sources see the overall construction unemployment numbers for the state as ranking in the top four industries — perhaps even No. 1 — in terms of the tightness of the labor market, contributing to overall unemployment numbers as low as 2.4 percent.

In Fort Collins, Doug Dohn, president of Dohn Construction Inc., said for commercial projects, the situation has gotten tight, with contractors necessary to keep buildings on schedule, especially framers, plumbers and drywall contractors who work with steel studs.

"There for a while, everyone was moving from one plumbing company to another — doing the same work for a higher wage — so it was tough on the subcontractors to keep their crews together," Dohn said. "But a lot of the shifting around has slowed down and improved."

Still, Dohn and other commercial contractors said there are few competitive bids out there — especially in certain fields, such as drywall. Another problem in Colorado is the lack of affordable housing.

"Even though there the labor market is tight everywhere, neighboring states have higher unemployment than we do," he said. "Before, in a typical scenario, a drywaller (from out of state) would see the per-foot price and figure they could make some good money. Now that housing costs are so much higher, they end up not taking the work because they can't do it for that price."

Over the winter, Dohn has also been busy with apartments, from low- to high-income and student housing, such as Prospect Station in Fort Collins. His company typically has 60 people on salary throughout the year, but now he is ramping up for upcoming projects in Fort Collins, Windsor, Greeley, Boulder and Estes Park.

"We're definitely selecting our work realizing that our subcontractor pool can only do so much. They still struggle to man the crews,” Dohn said. “We don’t want expectations or commitments that we can’t keep.”

In Longmont, Golden Triangle president Brian Laartz agreed that positions are not being filled by out-of-state craftspeople.

“There’s not going to be an easy way out of it,” Laartz said. “With my involvement in the AGC (Association of General Contractors) we’ve been working hard with recruiting from both high schools and the under-employed. It’s got a long way to go. It’s just going to be a while.”

Golden Triangle had about $18 million in commercial projects in Louisville’s Colorado Technology Center lined up at the beginning of the year, along with $35 million in major educational projects in Northern Colorado and $16 million in other major projects. Those were just the major projects, and Laartz said there has been a major management effort to keep crews moving forward.

“Having a lot of good work is always a good problem to have,” he said “It’s better than not having good work on hand.”

Acknowledging the lack of affordable housing, especially in condos, Laartz said he believes that the construction industry is just heated up all around the country. While there are some available workers from oil-dependent states such as Wyoming and New Mexico, those states also have construction work available.

“We try very hard to match our resources to the projects before us, and concentrate on working with our subcontractors to make sure we really plan their work to be as efficient as possible,” he said.

“We have not moved back our schedules. We’ve done a good job planning and managing our resources, though maybe we’ve turned down work to make sure we don’t overreach our resources.”

Both Laartz and Dohn said their standing with subcontractors is an important element in keeping projects moving. While some competitive bidding may have gone out the window, having established relationships are important in such times, they said.

At Roche Constructors in Greeley, Director of Preconstruction A.J. Roche said work is proceeding, but large projects have become more interesting from a planning aspect.

“We do have issues with the skilled trades, at least,” he said in a previous article.

While commercial projects are often thought of as requiring more skilled labor, Sinkey said that often isn’t the case with Boulder Creek neighborhoods.

“I think it’s a factor for us, especially because we try and specialize in maybe more complicated construction,” Sinkey said. “We’re looking for more diversity in architecture and more complication in structure, so we’re looking for a more skilled level of trade in our trade partners, and that’s increasingly less abundant.”

Sinkey also noted that maintaining a good working relationship with subcontractors — or as he called them “trade partners” — is increasingly important.

“We’ve worked really hard for years to maintain good relationships with our trade partners,” he said. “We try to be the first choice. Good relationships mean we can all in favors to get people to move things around, but we get there with good payment terms and reasonable expectations.

“But we also keep clear and reasonable expectations with our home buyers. We built every house we thought we were going to build last year. We did not miss a closing or close on an unfinished home.”

Groundbreaking

Commercial construction projects abound in the Boulder Valley and Northern Colorado. Here are a few of the region's most-prominent developments.

Colorado State University Medical Center

Northwest corner of South College Avenue and Prospect Road

Developer: Colorado State University

General contractor: Adolfsen & Peterson Construction

Architect: Bennett Wagner Grody Architects
