FROM THE PUBLISHERS

One would be hard-pressed to find an industry that is undergoing as much change as health care.

This is particularly true in the fast-growing region of Northern Colorado, where major hospital systems — Banner Health and UCHealth — are going head-to-head in Fort Collins, Greeley, Loveland and smaller communities, and where Kaiser Permanente entered the market just a few years ago.

Farther south, southern Larimer County and southwestern Weld County bring even more players into the mix, including SCL Health, Centura Health, Boulder Community Health and others.

Hospital systems also continue their spate of acquisitions of primary-care and specialty clinics throughout the region, as practitioners seek economies of scale and freedom from increasingly burdensome administrative requirements.

This edition of Northern Colorado MD captures a lot of that change, with updated listings on newly acquired practices, as well as other existing facilities and providers. This publication features more than 1,000 health-care facilities in Larimer and Weld counties, along with a roughly equal number of practitioners. Readers can use

Doc gets more patient time with scribe at the keyboard

By Dallas Heltzell
news@bizwest.com

In ancient times, a member of a learned class who copied holy writs and often served as a teacher was known as a “scribe.”

Today’s scribes are copying and teaching as well — but as invaluable members of health-care teams, helping doctors and physician’s assistants complete medical records in real time.

Physicians used to be able to focus solely on patient care, but with the advent of electronic health records in the 1970s, they suddenly found themselves burdened with documentation and clerical responsibilities that got in the way of interacting with people in their care.

Enter the medical scribe, essentially a personal assistant to the doctor. The scribe takes notes as the doctor talks with and treats a patient, thereby freeing up the physician both to have more face time with each patient and see more patients.

According to ScribeAmerica, a national company that trains and places scribes and whose Colorado offices include locations in Fort Collins and Loveland, being a scribe is a great experience for a pre-medical student who can gain real-world experience by shadowing a doctor.

Dr. John Bender, owner of Fort Collins-based Miramont Family Medicine, sees the job of scribe a bit differently.

“I don’t think a med student would make a good scribe — but they should learn how to use scribes,” he said. “Maybe they can work in that position for the first few months so they’re nicer to the scribe.”

Bender began using scribes “kind of inadvertently,” he said.

MICHAEL COPELIN / MIRAMONT FAMILY MEDICINE

Dr. John Bender and scribe Amelia “Maley” Birdwell assess a patient at Miramont Family Medicine in Fort Collins.

About seven years ago, “I had a partner who was diagnosed with a brain tumor,” Bender said. “I came into the office and told my office manager that we had to either cancel all his patients for six weeks and lay off a third of the staff or figure out how to see all of his and my patients at the same time.

“We’d just gone live with electronic health records. I didn’t really like typing all the time anyway, and asked my two most senior medical assistants if they could type while I was talking. They just had to fill in the template and I would give them the care plan. They would be able to finish with the patient still in the room, and I could get started in the next room with the other MA. By the time I was finished, the first MA would be ready again; we could just leapfrog.

“Before,” he said, “even though I was in the room 20 minutes with a patient, about half that time I wasn’t looking at the patient, just typing. Now I could spend more time with the patient.”

Please see Patient Time, page 6

Patient Time, from 5

Bender and his staff worked that way until his partner returned, then decided to extend the system — “and so our scribing program was born,” Bender said.

“There’s a lot of misunderstanding about how scribes can be used,” he said, noting that at a recent conference in Kansas City, he asked how many of the doctors used scribes and “not a single hand went up.”

Bender often fields colleagues’ questions about scribes, such as, “Will you excuse a female scribe when doing sensitive work on a male patient?” He answers, “No, I don’t.” They ask, “At the end of the day, don’t you check her work?” He answers, “No, I don’t need to.”

What about privacy? “It’s actually to patients’ advantage to have that person in the room,” he answers. “They quickly realize she is an access person to me. They can call between visits, and my scribe will answer the phone.

“Care coordination happens at a much quicker pace. The competency level is at a much higher level. She acts in some ways as a co-pilot. A good scribe will know my care plans almost as well as I do. If I’m treating a patient and forget something, my scribe will say, ‘Oh, Dr. Bender, don’t you also want to order such-and-such?’ She’s a cross check.”

Bender emphasized that his scribe is a full partner in patient care.

“This isn’t just a DragonSpeak thing where they’re just mindlessly typing the words,” he said. “It’s a team-based platform where we are talking back and forth, like a pilot and copilot in the cockpit.”

Pre-med students who serve as scribes in hospitals sometimes make as little as $10 an hour. Even though it’s not much money for a large time commitment that’s on top of a full undergraduate course load, many feel the experience is worth it.

In Bender’s scribe model, however, “We pay ours a little better than some — maybe $22 to $27 an hour,” he said. “At the absolutely lowest, I could pay $15 to $16 an hour, but I’d lose ‘em to UCHHealth and Banner (for other types of health-care jobs there) within a year.”

Many hospitals and health-care facilities haven’t figured out how to make scribing profitable yet “or made the business case for it,” Bender said. “We’ve been able to figure it out.”

Whereas a physician’s assistant is a provider who can diagnose and prescribe, while a medical assistant performs more rudimentary tasks such as taking vital signs and medical histories, Bender said, a scribe “sits in the room with the doctor and puts in all parts of the note. I can step out of the room and trust that the scribe is going to get all parts of my observation correctly.”

That trust is earned through careful training, he said. In Bender’s system, prospective scribes would work at Miramont for at least a year and earn a positive performance review. They’d need good basic English, syntax, grammar and spelling, and prove their skills as a medical assistant and customer-service provider. Next would come a six-week training program, “in which they shadow one of our scribes,” Bender said. “Then we put them onto a team and review their notes for about two weeks. They’re also reviewed by a biller because they know how to bill and code.”

Bender’s current scribe of choice, Amelia “Maley” Birdwell, has worked with him for three years.

Armed with an associate’s degree in radiology from Aims Community College, Birdwell was hired at Miramont in 2013 as an after-hours X-ray technician.

“I worked for a year, including some nights, with Dr. Bender,” she said. “I was transferred to days, then we got really busy one day. I knew my scribe training was coming, but he said, ‘Have a seat. Your scribe training begins now.’

“I like that I learn something new every day, from him and our patients — things I’d never learn in any other job,” Birdwell said. “I’m getting more medical knowledge and ways to better myself in the workforce, much more than being an MA roaming around and doing patient intake.”

Birdwell said it took her about six months to feel that she knew what Bender was thinking.

“Now, I can start typing the care plan even before he finishes telling the patient,” she said. “That’s been pretty fun. It happens every day. I know what he’s going to do sometimes even before he says it. But every decision I make, I go back to Dr. Bender and make sure that’s something he would like.

“I enter the room a couple moments after Dr. Bender has already started, so he has a chance to address a patient’s complaints,” she said. “I enter the room as he’s doing that, and I take over the computer. When he leaves, it’s my responsibility to walk the patient to the front to our checkout station, where I do what’s called a ‘warm handoff’ to our receptionist to schedule future appointments either with him or any of our other services, including psych, clinical or the pharmacist.

“I hand them a care plan, printed out, because they might understand it in the room but as soon as they leave the building, they’re like ‘What was this again?’

“Some of them say they’d come and see me if Dr. Bender was out of town,” she said. Even though she knows that as a scribe she can’t perform the duties of a physician’s assistant, “those statements are pretty cool to hear.”

Cool enough to want to advance to the post of PA — or even physician?

“Dr. Bender asks me every week if I’m going back to school to be a PA,” Birdwell said. “Every week, I tell him, ‘Not quite yet; I really appreciate what I do. Just being able to experience what our doctors and nurse practitioners do daily is rewarding. I’m really happy where I’m at right now.’

For Bender, that spells relief.

About 64 percent of U.S. physicians show signs of burnout, he said, mostly from dealing with regulations and electronic health records.

“Scribes go a long way to alleviate both physician and patient unhappiness,” Bender said. “It improves my quality of life. I’d never go back.”

New hospitals trigger healthy competition for workers

KATI BLOCKER / UCHEALTH

Dan Robinson, chief executive of University of Colorado Health's new Longs Peak Hospital, greets two women who attended the hospital's May 15 hiring event at the Best Western Plus Plaza Convention Center in Longmont.

By Dallas Heltzell
news@bizwest.com

Drivers heading north from Denver on Interstate 25 aren't yet confronted with a road sign reading "Hospital: Next 14 Exits" — but it may not be long.

Major new health-care facilities have sprouted along the busy I-25 corridor in Fort Collins and Loveland, a new hospital will open on the eastern edge of Longmont late this summer, and another is likely to be up and running by 2019 in Greeley — not to mention a new hospital that opened last year in Broomfield. In addition, new clinics, urgent-care facilities, assisted-living and senior-care centers seem to pop up every month.

So many are opening or planned that Gov. John Hickenlooper last year even considered pushing a proposal to create state certificates of need for hospitals, asking the Legislature's Joint Budget Committee, "Should we have as many hospitals as we have?"

Growth projections for Northern Colorado and the Boulder Valley indicate the need is there — but how will all these new health-care facilities find enough workers to staff them — especially with the area's unemployment rates at or near national lows?

"Low unemployment's a problem, and we've been predicting a registered-nurse shortage for a long time," said Yvonne Myers, health-systems director for Fort Collins-based Columbine Health. "Everyone's fighting for a good nurse."

The hospitals and other care centers are competing not only for nurses and doctors, but also for technicians as well as clerical, information-technology, maintenance and other workers.

"Sometimes, we're looking for a chef too," Myers said.

"We have a significant number of positions where we have a tremendous amount of interest, and others where we've not had as many applicants as we need," said Dan Robinson, chief executive of University of Colorado Health's new $192 million Longs Peak Hospital, which is receiving its finishing touches in Longmont. "We've hired over 210 people as of today, but it's going to take 300 to open our hospital later this summer. We need OR nurses, specialty nurses, radiology technicians, cardiac techs. We have another 80 or 90 to hire before we actually open, so we're anxious about the next couple months — even though we have a great resume pool.

“We have a lot of applicants, but we're concerned that the application pool is becoming smaller.”

Robinson said his greatest staffing challenge is finding enough nurses for operating rooms and other specialties, but added that “those are also challenges at other health-care institutions. The shortage is not just us; it's within the industry. We're competing for the best talent with other organizations.”

Margo Karsten, Banner Health's chief executive for Northern Colorado, echoed the need for experienced specialty nurses — especially for critical care, the emergency and operating rooms — but also cited difficulties finding enough experienced lab managers, phlebotomists and medical assistants, as well as food and nutrition specialists, office help and maintenance people.

“High demand, low supply,” she said.

“Each modality of care needs a specialized radiologist,” Karsten added. “We haven't seen a shortage of those yet, but we're still watching it.”

The Colorado Division of Labor and Employment ranked nursing seventh on a list of jobs projected to be most in demand through 2024, but first by a mile for the number of job ads posted during April — nearly double the second-place profession, truck drivers.

Driving the health-care construction boom is rapid population growth along the northern Front Range, and much of that population is aging Baby Boomers.

“As the population grows and ages, we know we have to have more health-care facilities to take care of that need,” Robinson said.

That aging demographic falls squarely into the wheelhouse of Columbine Health, which provides housing and care for seniors at many levels. The challenge for Myers is finding workers who can relate to them.

“We always work on that prospective

Crews have been building the 210,000-square-foot Longs Peak Hospital, on the northwest corner of Colorado Highway 119 and County Line Road on the east edge of Longmont. employee who likes to take care of older adults. If you love that, you want to stay,” she said. “But if you're a new grad, you're not thinking of that — so we have a program to get them to think about caring for people in their 80s and 90s.”

Younger arrivals, however, largely are attracted by Colorado's world-renowned quality of life — especially that mountainous horizon to the west.

Longs Peak Hospital “is positioned so Longs Peak is very prominent in the background when you drive into Longmont, going west on 119,” Robinson said. “That environment is conducive to people wanting to move here.”

When UCHHealth decided Longmont needed a second major facility to join Centura Health's Longmont United Hospital, it looked at figures showing that the city and the surrounding communities including Niwot, Erie, Firestone, Frederick and Dacono had a combined population of 195,000 that probably would swell to 215,800 just three years from now.

UCHHealth determined that central Weld County also needed a second hospital because more than 6,000 of the 65,000 patients its Greeley-area clinics treated in the past two years had to leave town to be admitted to another UCHHealth hospital — Poudre Valley in Fort Collins or Medical Center of the Rockies in Loveland. Ground was broken in April for the 53-bed Greeley hospital, planned to be the centerpiece of a $185 million medical campus southeast of U.S. Highway 34 and 71st Street.

Conventional wisdom would suggest that the population boom would mean plenty of workers from which to choose. A thorn in that rosy scenario is the area's cost of housing, which many nurses on the message boards at allnurses.com called too steep to be affordable on the salaries health-care facilities were offering.

“As competition increases, it does create pressure to raise wages,” Robinson said. “It does increase our costs, but it is expected. National and local averages are increasing at a more-frequent rate than we would have expected. To compete, in some cases we have to pay a bit more for moving expenses, or our on-call compensation may need to be increased for

Gaining on pain Area ERs part of statewide program to find alternatives to addictive opioids

By Dallas Heltzell
news@bizwest.com

Colorado has the 12th highest rate of misuse and abuse of prescription opioids. Now, emergency-room physicians whose previous pain-management practices may have contributed to the drug-addiction problem are working to solve it.

Eight Colorado hospitals and three freestanding emergency rooms are in the midst of a six-month pilot program launched by the Colorado Hospital Association to reduce administration of opioids by 15 percent or more. Participants in the Colorado program include MCR as well as UCHealth's Poudre Valley Hospital and Harmony Road emergency room in Fort Collins, its Emergency and Surgery Center in Greeley, and Boulder Community Health's Foothills Hospital in Boulder and Community Medical Center in Lafayette.

Many ER physicians used to regard the level of pain a patient reported, on a 0-to-10 scale, as the "fifth vital sign" along with temperature, heart rate, respiration rate and blood pressure, said Dr. Jamie Teumer, who leads the emergency departments at UCHealth's Medical Center of the Rockies in Loveland and the new Longs Peak Hospital, which opened Aug. 31 in Longmont. "We had this huge push to give everybody pain relief. That's when we started this problem. We should have seen this trend going on. We should be solving it."

Upon conclusion of the pilot program, CHA will compile and release data from all participating hospitals, with the goal of generating new guidelines for reducing opioid use that ultimately will be implemented in emergency departments across the state.

President Trump in early August declared the opioid epidemic a national emergency after the commission he empowered to study the matter reported that 142 Americans die of drug overdoses every day. Although much of the publicity has focused on Medicaid recipients, a report by Amino, a company that compiles public-health and medical-pricing data, found that "1.4 million privately insured patients were diagnosed with opioid use disorder in 2016 — six times more than in 2012."

The rate at which potent drugs such as morphine, codeine and fentanyl are prescribed has quadrupled since 1999, according to a BCH statement that said opioids, both prescription and illegal, have become the leading cause of accidental death in the United States.

A study by researchers at Harvard University's T.H. Chan School of Public Health found that people seen by an emergency-room physician who tends to prescribe opioids frequently are about 30 percent more likely to take them for at least six more months in the ensuing year.

"Fifteen years ago, the culture surrounding pain management and expectations were really confusing," said Dr. Tim Meyers, who runs the emergency departments at BCH. "The expectation was that opioids represented the serious approach, and if patients weren't getting it, then physicians weren't taking patients' complaints seriously.

"We've been able to reframe our conversations with patients about what our best practices are," Meyers said. "Just because they're not getting narcotics as the first line of treatment doesn't mean the doctor isn't taking their pain seriously."

"We still assess pain, but don't do it so early in the approach," Teumer added. "It's just not feasible to stop pain 100 percent, but we can make it tolerable so it will continue to get better and their pain level will go down. Now, we're asking, 'What would be acceptable level for you to go home at?'"

Participants in the pilot program are following guidelines developed by the Colorado chapter of the American College of Emergency Physicians about when and how opioids can be avoided by using alternative treatments and strategies. Teumer and Meyers say they've discovered that those alternatives often provide more-effective pain relief.

"They're often not only competitive but better," Meyers said, especially for relief of pain related to kidney stones, migraine headaches, back pain and spasms. Injectable forms of Tylenol (Acetaminophen) and ibuprofen often do a much better job." Ibuprofen is the less-costly alternative.

"Injectable Tylenol is very expensive, but we use it orally," Teumer said. Meyers speculated that the cost difference is because injectable Tylenol still is under trademark, while ibuprofen isn't.

Meyers said he learned first-hand that Toradol, the brand name for Ketorolac, a non-steroidal anti-inflammatory drug similar to ibuprofen, really did provide better relief for acute pain than did the addictive narcotics.

"Every now and then you'll find yourself on the other side of the table as a patient," Meyers said. "I developed a kidney stone while on a bike trip. I was miserable. My pain was excruciating. I sort of went into the ER with skepticism about the injectable Ibuprofen — but within five minutes, I was completely pain-free.

"Now I'm sensitive to it when patients come in and they're miserable with a kidney stone," he said. "A huge percentage become totally pain free. The narcotic medications absolutely don't have that response. They get euphoria, sleepy, distracted — but in terms of the actual prime response, they really don't compare with Toradol."

Teumer said his ERs used to administer morphine for patients with kidney-stone pain, but have found that intravenous Lidocaine is more effective in most cases.

"Migraine headaches, too," Meyers said. "Narcotics can do an OK job of treating a headache acutely, but when you give it to them you put them at risk for a rebound headache when that medicine wears off. The anti-nausea meds we give are terrific for migraines."

Even older patients who suffer broken hips can benefit from the alternative treatments, Meyers said. "That population in particular is really vulnerable with the side effects of narcotics because they slow down their breathing and create some demand and stress on their body because of their ability to ventilate."

Hospitals also are cautious about people who falsely complain of pain in order to receive the narcotics to which they're already addicted, because, Teumer said, "the word gets out on the street."

His hospitals' patient treatment committee "reviews 30 cases a month that, because of their history, we will not give them stuff," Teumer said. "But when you come in with a broken leg, we're not going to mess around. You'll still get the pain meds you need."

Even so, noted Dr. Steve Wright, vice president of the Colorado Pain Society and treasurer of the Colorado Society of Addiction Medicine, "it takes quite a skill set to determine whether this person is subject to addiction and this one isn't. It may be more important to develop addiction treatment — but the key element is early detection, and that's the real challenge.

"There are some individuals who do not have a life if they are not on opioids," he said.

Wright emphasized that blame for the opioid epidemic shouldn't be laid exclusively at the feet of doctors or Big Pharma.

"There's a supply side and a demand side of the problem," he said. "The supply-side issues may have some utility, but the demand side might have better utility. A couple studies addressing why overdose deaths occur found that 80 percent in one study and 95 percent in another had addiction characteristics before death. We need to employ risk management, identify individuals in trouble with opioids and get them off of them.

"Yes, prescribers in general probably deliver more opioids for acute pain than we should," Wright said, "but 70 percent of the opioids end up not being used. They sit on the shelf, and then some neighbor kid comes and picks them up and launches his addiction career. That's why to give 30 days of opioid for somebody who had a tooth extracted is totally unnecessary and puts the community at risk."

Wright said the focus shouldn't be limited to addictive medications.

"The anti-inflammatories may be just as effective, but they have risks too," he said. "We can't be cavalier about not risk-managing other substances that we write prescriptions for.

"You want to make sure you have analgesia — pain relief," Wright said. "I'm confident there is a lot more out there available for pain relief that we really know and understand right now. It may well be that there are certain situations where opioids are most effective, but any way we can minimize them is a good thing."

Those ways should include delivering fewer of them in acute-pain settings but also getting rid of the unused pills on people's shelves by using "take-back days." "Individuals can bring their meds into places — typically police stations — and drop them off," he said. "We had 20,000 take-backs alone across the state on a rainy day last April."

Meanwhile, Teumer and Meyers said they were optimistic about the pilot program.

"People that are truly there for pain relief don't give us a lot of pushback" about using the alternative medications now, Teumer said. "At some point, we make it clear that there are things we are and aren't going to do."

"The key is just having a good conversation with your patient about what's going on," Meyers added. "Take a minute or two to explain why they're not getting narcotics. If they're having real pain, they're on board with it. They want their doctor to do what's in their best interests and get them feeling better quicker."

SOCIAL INPUTS

Non-traditional factors become silent health risks.

By Emily Clingman
news@bizwest.com

Northern Colorado and the Boulder Valley are great places to live, but we are also victims of our own success. The high-performing region with university-educated residents has resulted in escalated real estate costs and brutal commutes along the Front Range. These two dynamics alone may sound like urban planning or development issues, but they are also becoming factors that influence the quality of health among the region's residents.

Non-health-related factors that influence health — also known as social determinants of health — are becoming more prevalent in the region. Transportation, housing, food, fitness, substance use — these are all lifestyle issues that, if problematic or left unchecked, contribute significantly to chronic and deadly health conditions.

Dr. Austin Bailey, medical director of primary care at UCHHealth Medical Group, said there are more people than one might think affected physically and mentally by environmental and social stress. There are also unnoticed populations that are highly affected by certain societal factors.

“Seniors, for example,” Bailey said. “They are on a fixed, limited income and it’s not unusual to have conversations with them about which medications can be stopped because affordability is a problem. They don’t have enough money to buy rent, food and medication.”

Scrimping on sustenance

Less-obvious factors in health quality present specifically to an individual neighborhood or community. For example, the downtown Safeway grocery store in Fort Collins has closed, and a higher-end chain — Lucky’s Market — is slated to move in. It could be viewed as a plus to some residents of that neighborhood, but a senior-living complex is located around the corner, and there isn’t another affordable grocery store that is within walking distance for residents that don’t or can’t drive.

“Suddenly, a more-expensive store limits their ability in what they can buy to eat in a healthy way,” Bailey said. “We call these areas food deserts. A lot of times, we assume people have transportation to get out of a neighborhood, but they really don’t. When you look at what is available to them in their neighborhood that’s healthy, you find it’s not affordable, or the food that is available (at the corner gas station, for instance) holds little nutritional value.”

Bailey noted that the average American’s income has increased only 7 percent in the last five years, “so just about everybody is on some sort of fixed budget.”

As the cost of basic components to survival increases, some people will start to scrimp on food. They will look for the cheapest option, but the most economical food is not always the healthiest food.

“It is possible to eat healthy economically, but it’s not obvious. It’s not user-friendly,” Bailey said. “Not everyone knows how or has time to cook from scratch. That’s something that people have to be taught to do.”

So, people choose cheap and convenient, such as ramen noodles or Taco Bell, particularly if one has to work extended hours or more than one job to make ends meet. They find the convenience outweighs the benefits of budgeting the money and time to eat healthy. And, they include their children in this cycle.

Mobility crisis

The same concept applies to mobility and fitness. The way a neighborhood is designed or the condition of a certain area can also affect health quality in a negative way. If there are no sidewalks, or if there’s a lot of traffic, people with disabilities have a harder time getting around, and if there are no safe and accessible places to exercise, residents will forgo an important component of good health.

Another connected issue is commuting. According to the Boulder Valley Comprehensive Plan, there are 64,000 commuters coming in and out of Boulder every weekday. Commuting daily along the congested Front Range for two to four hours a day is horrid on the body, Bailey says. It takes away time that could be spent preparing a healthy meal or exercising. The sedentary lifestyle added to a poor diet directly contributes to chronic conditions such as hypertension, obesity, diabetes, and heart disease.

These environmental and societal issues not only affect people physically, but also take a mental toll, too — which again, contributes to the decline of good physical health.

Stuck to the screen

Kevin Unger, president and CEO of UCHHealth Poudre Valley Hospital and UCHHealth Medical Center of the Rockies, points to technology as a significant social determinant. For example, Millennials would really prefer not to leave their house for medical care if possible, so they are very open to using online patient portals or engaging in Skype visits with their provider.

“There are a lot of benefits to the Internet, but it can play back into the sedentary lifestyle,” Unger said. “Were all having more screen time, which is a con. Also, not everyone can afford Internet access, so those people miss out on the benefits of online information and access to health care available to them.”

Bailey noted that some research is showing that the human attention span is shortening as screen time increases. He adds that the Internet is a great way to stay connected with people, though, which is imperative to a better feeling of well-being.

“There are pros and cons,” Bailey said. “And we don’t fully appreciate the depth of that yet.”

The silent tragedy

Unger said there are two dynamics affecting Northern Colorado that are not often considered when evaluating the health of the community—suicide and a substantial decrease in birth rate.

“If you’re a young family, it can become a real issue in trying to find affordable housing in Northern Colorado,” Unger said. “There’s aren’t a lot of good options. Our community is aging, but we’re not seeing that repopulated with younger people because they can’t afford to live in this region.”

Northern Colorado also has a higher-than-average suicide rate.

“When you live in a high-performing society, where people are so highly educated, those pressures can mount,” Unger said. “There are a lot of social pressures that occur within Northern Colorado.”

Bailey added that racism is considerable in the region, “not nearly as flagrant in Northern Colorado as in other parts of the state, yet, it still exists here,” he said. “Especially in Fort Collins, Loveland and Greeley. There are things that need to be addressed.”

Comfort in numbers

The take-away message is not necessarily to be aware that there are people out there that are disadvantaged and need help or empathy. The reality is that almost everybody in Northern Colorado is struggling with survival and lifestyle issues that are subtly, or sometimes aggressively, taking shots at the quality of our physical and mental health.

“It’s an assumption that everyone is happy in Colorado—good jobs, active life—but there are a lot of families in Northern Colorado that are under a lot of stress right now, sort of suffering in silence,” Bailey said. “You are not alone. Talk about it with your health-care provider. Social determinants are not something we normally screen for, so physicians may not initially pick up on it. That way, your doctor can know what factors are influencing your personal health and advise specific courses of action and tangible options.”

Money woes stress out young adults; children more at risk around guns

By Emily Clingman
news@bizwest.com

Recently, Dr. Eric Sigel, professor of pediatrics at the University of Colorado School of Medicine and adolescent medicine specialist at Children's Hospital Colorado, revealed new research showing that kids who report potential access to guns — it's easy to get guns, they know where to get guns, or have friends with guns — saw higher rates of mental-health issues and violent tendencies.

"That combination can lead to a lethal situation," Sigel said.

Kids who report having emotional issues such as anxiety, depression or eating disorders and have increased access to guns are in a very vulnerable situation.

"If you are a parent, adult or health-care provider, you need to be really cognizant of that," Sigel said. "We need to have a conversation as a society about this potential lethal interaction, to really make sure that kids do not have access to guns."

The study was conducted only in two neighborhoods in Denver so it's not representative of the whole population, or to upper-middle-class people living in Boulder necessarily, but the lessons apply to everyone.

"We do know that statistics show the safest home for a kid is a home with no guns," Sigel said. "Recognizing that people do possess firearms for hunting, protection or target shooting, the next-best scenario is that they are locked up unloaded and the ammunition is locked away in a separate place. Make sure the kids don't know the keycode."

Establishing a better understanding of youth and guns is a newer construct because there isn't a lot of comparison, as there has been a ban on federal funding of research focused on firearms. Sigel notes that the motor-vehicle accident rate had been cut in half during that same time period because of research.

Tech trouble

Technology can really compromise the health of youth in many ways. Too much screen time is associated with a whole host of issues — sleep deprivation, increased aggression, not attending to a general expectation with chores, losing levels of social skills and a decreased attention span. Online peer bullying has become an epidemic, which takes a dangerous toll on the young minds of the bullied.

"Communication and interaction might truly be changed by our tech age," Sigel said. "When a kid can't call a friend to say, 'Hey what's up' or 'I have an issue I need to talk about,' like we used to, it creates a void. Now kids just text emojis for communication. That's not a good replacement."

Those at higher risk

One population of youth that faces enhanced physical and mental-health risks is the GLBTQ community.

"We have come a long way, but still a long way to go," Sigel said. "In general, there is a much healthier acceptance, but GLBTQ kids, especially transgender, are at a higher risk for any adolescent issue — more depression, more risk of suicide and substance abuse, more sexual experimentation with STD risk."

Sigel says there is extensive training at Children's Hospital, and the residents have become accustomed to working with GLBTQ youth. He would like to see "more and more and more" providers who are sensitized and aware of the particular physical and emotional health needs of the GLBTQ community.

Protecting all youth

A preemptive strike is crucial when it comes ensuring quality youth health.

"The key is recognizing that intervention is really critical, and there's a lot that can be done if society continues to support health care," Sigel said. "If kids get engaged in primary care and have access to services early on, a lot of the morbidities related to adolescent and adult health can be averted. One of the critical things we are understanding on a societal level is that the stressors that kids are exposed to really contribute to life-long health."

Adverse childhood experiences such as food insecurity, exposure to parental mental-health issues, emotional or sexual abuse, alcoholic or incarcerated parents — accumulate, and kids have mental issues: depression, anxiety, post-traumatic stress. This all converts to having major physical health issues. Stressors cause inflammation, hypertension, obesity and diabetes, as well as other health issues.

"If we can really improve adolescent and young adult health," Sigel said. "We can avert most of these things down the road and make us all healthier."

Wayfinding woes

As 20-somethings fly the coop, they are finding that "adulthood" is legitimately stressful, which sometimes can cause mental anxiety. Josh Johnson, 20, lives in Longmont and works as an assistant manager at a local tire shop. While he admits that he makes better money than some of his peers, he still falls behind on his bills. He said he feels pressure to "do better," but comes up short when

FINDING HEALTH PROBLEMS EARLY SAVES LIVES

The earlier a health problem is detected, the better chance there is for a cure. Since 1976, Advanced Medical Imaging Consultants (AMIC) has helped doctors and their patients pinpoint health problems using the most advanced medical imaging exams available. Our team includes 42 board-certified radiologists, most of whom have completed subspecialty fellowship training.

AMIC CAPABILITIES

- ▶ CT (computed tomography), including CTA (computed tomography angiography), CT cardiac calcium scoring, CT lung scan, and CT virtual colonoscopy
- ▶ Interventional radiology, including diagnostic angiography, carotid stenting, radiofrequency ablation (RFA), uterine fibroid embolization (UFE), and vertebroplasty
- ▶ MRI (magnetic resonance imaging), including MRA (magnetic resonance angiography) and cardiac MRI
- ▶ Womens imaging, including digital mammography with computer-aided detection (CAD), breast MRI, and stereotactic breast biopsy
- ▶ Neuroradiology
- ▶ Traditional X-rays
- ▶ Ultrasound, including Doppler studies
- ▶ Bone densitometry (DEXA scans)
- ▶ Nuclear medicine, including PET (positron emission tomography)
- ▶ Musculoskeletal/orthopedic radiology

More TIME and MONEY for the things you actually enjoy!

We understand there are many things you would rather do than spend a lot of time and money for medical imaging. That's why we provide value, convenience, and quality care for all our patients.

The Imaging Center is a local and independent provider of MRI, CT, ultrasound, and x-ray exams for over 17 years. We even offer the only high-strength open MRI in northern Colorado.

A BETTER WAY TO TAKE CARE OF BUSINESS

You don't profit from sick employees. Why does your health provider?

In an industry built on fee-for-service care, Kaiser Permanente succeeds because we're built around prevention and the highest quality care. One Harvard Business Review article described our care as "untainted by any economic conflict of interest."* And an industry report by The Economist said we promote economy and quality care with "no financial motive to order unnecessary procedures."†

Choose better. Choose Kaiser Permanente.
