Outdoor Retailer Show

Colorado's mountains mean towering economic benefits to the state. It's home to many manufacturers of outdoor gear and recreation-based media. People come from around the world to enjoy its rivers and slopes.

Outdoor industry boosters estimate recreation generates $28 billion in consumer spending and supports 229,000 jobs in Colorado.

That makes it a natural home for the country's largest recreation trade show.

After months of negotiations between multiple organizations, organizers announced in July that the popular Outdoor Retailer Show is moving to Denver. The twice-a-year event, which was held in Salt Lake City for more than two decades, will take over the Colorado Convention Center for the next five years. The first Mile High

City show will be in late January 2018.

It's a highly-coveted event for a recreation-minded state. It also provides a big economic shot in the arm — up to $50 million per show, according to Rachel Benedick, vice president of sales and services at the Denver Convention & Visitor's Bureau. But the benefit will extend far beyond the shows.

"The long-term economic value will come from continuing to establish our region as not just a great place to convene, but a great place to do business," said J. J. Ament, CEO of the Denver Chamber of Commerce. "We're hopeful and expect that many startups and enterprise-level companies in this industry will relocate or expand operations here in Colorado."

The move to Denver follows nearly a year-and-a-half of back-and-forth between the Denver Convention & Visitor's Bureau, the Colorado Outdoor Recreation Industry Office, Boulder's Outdoor Industry Association, and the trade show's owner, Canadian-based Emerald Expositions.

Part of the reason for the move is political. Show organizers had grown increasingly unhappy with what they felt was Utah's efforts to roll back access to public lands. The tipping point came when the governor and some politicians in the Beehive State began actively lobbying the Trump Administration to downsize the 1.35 million-acre Bears Ears National Monument in southern Utah, which was created by the Obama Administration in the final months of its term. Show organizers specifically cited Colorado's support for public lands as a key reason for deciding to relocate to Denver.

"We chose Denver for Outdoor Retailer's home because the city, Colorado as a whole, and its residents and policymakers understand and reflect the sentiment that outdoor recreation and the protection of public lands shouldn't be politically polarizing issues," said Jennifer Pringle, vice president of marketing and research for the Outdoor Industry Association.

Others echoed that sentiment, including Kim Miller, CEO of SCARPA North America. The nearly 80-year-old company, which has offices in Boulder, manufactures hiking, rock climbing, skiing, and mountaineering footwear.

"One of the biggest shared values in this industry is around the preservation and protection of public lands," he said. "It was clear that the governor of Utah did not share these same values and, in my opinion, this event could no longer be held in Utah and be supported by the industry."

The shows will be held at the 584,000 square-foot Colorado Convention Center. The Outdoor Retailer and Snow Show is slated for Jan. 25-28, and the Summer Market is July 23-26. The Outdoor Retailer Winter Market is Nov. 8-11. After that, the new agreement with Denver calls for two shows per year.

Each show is expected to draw up to 25,000 attendees and thousands of buyers. They'll engage with hundreds of manufacturers, shop owners, and outdoor media representatives. The convention center may eventually be too small, so future shows may spill over to the National Western Complex.

The OR show is often a place for outdoor gear makers to introduce and demonstrate new products.

"That's our launch pad," said Jake Thamm, CEO of Crescent Moon Snowshoes, also based in Boulder. His company has been attending the shows for 21 years, and counts them as key to building his customer base. "It's where we meet a number of our current and past retail accounts and walk-in traffic has resulted in many new accounts, particularly in the last few years as our brand has become better recognized by the market."

Thamm added that he finds the show to be a place for his company to show its direction and innovation. It's also exciting, because it includes talks about public-lands policy, conservation efforts, and other industry specific topics. "It's mostly a collegial atmosphere where like-minded outdoors enthusiasts gather to share a passion."

SCARPA's Kim Miller agrees.

"It is the stage we use twice a year to show the world what we are working on, not just in products but in terms of higher-level issues and topics that are relevant to all of us."

His company's presence at the show includes more than products. He estimates that with staff, brand ambassadors, athletes, and strategic partners, SCARPA will have more than 40 people at each of the events next year.

Johnson also feels Denver's location and hipness appeal will make the trade show even more popular.

"It also helps SCARPA because Denver is one of the hottest and most attractive cities in the country right now," he said. "People like the culture and vibe of Denver, it is easier to get to in many cases, and there are also benefits like more hotel rooms as well as a more diverse availability of entertainment."

The OIA's Pringle also pointed out that for many recreational manufacturers, being located in Colorado is important to being authentic to their brands.

"With Colorado's outdoor recreation opportunities, its thriving economy, political environment and now the Outdoor Retailer Shows, we hope to see even more outdoor companies come to the state."

She believes the show's move to Denver will only bring more gear makers to Colorado.

"From an employment standpoint, the mayor and governor will tell you, this state's outdoor assets are among its greatest recruitment and retention tools for businesses that want to be where the work-hard-play-hard pedigree thrives. After all, healthy employees are happy employees are productive employees."

"We're one of the few places in the world who combine a vibrant economy and a fabulous outdoor experience," added Denver Chamber's Ament.

Colorado showed an early interest in hosting the OR show, once the OIA starting looking for a new home for them. Several other cities vied for them, including Reno, Nev. But Colorado politicians and leaders of Colorado's outdoor industry, who had already been trying to nab the event, stepped up their campaigns to move it to Colorado. Part of the impetus was seeing its longtime benefit to the Salt Lake City area, and recognizing that it would only help Colorado.

The group Conservation Colorado even placed an ad in two Utah newspapers last year, urging the OIA to move the trade shows to Colorado.

"We have stronger beer. We have taller peaks. We have higher recreation," the ad reads. "But most of all, we love our public lands..."

"When there is a nexus of support for public lands crossed with a population driven to access them, said Jennifer Pringle of the OIA, "businesses and communities thrive. As our industry has seen throughout the nation, healthy communities that have ample outdoor recreation access and opportunities make for stronger and healthier economies."

Added Ament, "We couldn't be happier to have the biggest trade shows in outdoor recreation coming to Colorado."

BOULDER — Outdoor recreation generates $28 billion in consumer spending annually in Colorado, according to a report from the Outdoor Industry Association.

The Outdoor Recreation Economy State Report shows that outdoor recreation provides 229,000 jobs and $10 billion in wages and salaries. Outdoor rec also contributes $2 billion in state and local tax revenue.

“Colorado has a lot going for it in terms of outdoor recreation access and economics — people choose to live in Colorado because of the healthy, fun lifestyle that exists here, and the businesses that thrive here, rightly take advantage of the strong employee base that loves to get outdoors,” said Amy Roberts, executive director of OIA, in a prepared statement. “It is no coincidence that growth in Colorado’s outdoor recreation economy has coincided with Colorado continuing to be ranked as a leader in the nation in overall economic growth, the growth of new businesses and as a healthy population overall.”

More than 71 percent of the state’s 5.7 million residents participate in outdoor activities each year.

Moving forward, the OIA requests that policymakers use the economic impact of outdoor rec to adequately fund state and local parks and trails, as well as raise awareness of public lands and the outdoor economy.

OIA and members promote sustainability in product lines

BY MARK DUGGAN
news@bizwest.com

Sustainability. It's become a buzzword in business, and particularly in the outdoor gear and recreational products industries. Broadly, sustainability means the capacity to endure. In business, the term refers to governance and manufacturing practices that seek to improve the environment, as well as human and animal welfare.

Companies that publicly identify as sustainable often see increased credibility and customer loyalty, which leads to new markets, an expanded customer base and increased sales. Some customers specifically require sustainable practices from the businesses they patronize, and more employees are embracing and even demanding it.

It's not always easy for an existing company to step into sustainable practices. Sometimes they have to completely change their internal culture. Manufacturing firms have to reimagine and retool existing infrastructure. Vendors must be dropped in favor of new partners that also operate with sustainability practices.

It comes a bit more naturally for other businesses. Colorado's outdoor gear industry has led the way in adopting sustainable practices. According to Beth Jensen, senior director of Sustainable Business Innovation at the Outdoor Industry Association, sustainability is an imperative for the industry.

"You're using these products to play in the outdoors," Jensen said. "If we're not looking at how we're protecting those places to play in terms of the impacts of making those products, we're missing a critical link."

Beth Jensen

The OIA's member organizations have been collaborating on what's known as the Sustainability Working Group, or SWG. Formed a decade ago, it includes some of the biggest names in the outdoor products industry.

"Patagonia, North Face, REI, and all of our companies are collaboratively determining what the best practices and standards should be in the supply chain," explained Jensen. "We're all sharing many of the same suppliers, and manufacturing in the same places, so it's beneficial for us to combine forces."

SWG priority issues include animal welfare, chemicals management, materials traceability, and social responsibility.

Many recreational products businesses also cite a personal reason for founding a business that adheres to sustainable practices.

Nova Covington, CEO of Boulder-based

A poster in the Outdoor Industries Association office speaks to the group's emphasis on sustainability

COURTESY OIA

Goddess Garden Organics, said the idea for her company came when she discovered her daughter Paige was allergic to the chemicals in traditional cosmetic products. That led her to start a company that manufactures organic skin care products such as sunscreen and lip balm. She sees the same level of personal concern with her customers.

“They ask thoughtful questions about everything from environmental impact, to allergens and skin reactions.”

Covington has hard numbers to demonstrate how her company is providing sustainable solutions for her customers. She pointed out that most sunscreen products contain the chemical oxybenzone, which can contaminate water. Goddess Garden Organics is helping to reduce its prevalence.

“So far this year,” she said, “we’ve displaced 4,837,890 ounces of chemicals, saving enough water to fill Puget Sound 19 times. By using organic, plant-based ingredients, we’re supporting sustainable farming practices and driving demand for products that are grown with the environment in mind.”

Water issues also come into play with the Sustainability Working Group, said Beth Jensen. One of its campaigns is to reduce micro-fiber pollution.

“All garments are shedding tiny fibers when you wash them in the washing machine,” explained Jensen. “Those fibers are going into oceans and waterways.”

The SWG is working with wastewater treatment plants and the appliance industry to create better filtering technology, and with suppliers to design fabrics that shed little or no micro-fibers.

As outdoor products manufacturers look at whether their impact on the environment is bigger than the products they consume, they undertake projects to ‘green’ their supply chains and operations. They partner and share knowledge with environmentally innovative vendors. Internally, they enact practices such as using intelligent lighting and timed thermostats, and institute policies mandating the use of energy-efficient light bulbs and biodegradable paper towels. Employees are asked to buy in to such principles.

This way of thinking starts at the top, with the company’s founders. Many smaller outdoor products manufacturers got into business in part because their personal values include protecting the environment. They haven’t forgotten about profits, but they also want to contribute to society on a deeper level. Many with children want to make sure they leave something for future generations.

This way of thinking is now extending to larger, more traditional businesses. One of OIA’s initiatives, the Sustainable Apparel Coalition, now works with fashion brands such as Gap and Levi’s, and sporting goods brands Nike and Puma.

But the outdoor industry forged the path. According to Beth Jensen, representatives from REI and Timberland were talking at a 2007 outdoor retail trade show, and decided to develop a standardized rating system and shared best practices, in order to better define sustainability for brands and products.

The result for many makers of outdoor gear and recreational products has been increased profits, but not at the expense of their values.

“We have sustainability built into every aspect of our business,” said Green Goddess’s Nora Covington. “Sometimes that means we need to make tough decisions, but at the end of the day, those decisions aren’t all that difficult. From a strictly business view, we more than doubled the number of retailers that carried our products in 2017, so we believe doing the right thing is better in all ways.”

Even bankers are starting to take notice. Boulder’s New Resource Bank specifically lends money only to businesses and organizations that identify as sustainable.

According to Susan Graf, the bank’s Vice President and Regional Development Manager, that includes organizations “that put people and planet first in their governance and operations.”

How did a bank decide on supporting sustainability?

“Our investors and early depositors saw money as an agent of positive social, environmental and economic change,” said Graf. “We believe that money and banking can transform the economy into one that serves all people and the planet.”

New Resource Bank will only lend money to a company after its taken a survey to measure its impact on the environment, their employees, and the community. It’s also queried on methods of governance. Companies aren’t assigned a minimum score, but do have to show a good track record and commitment of operating in a sustainable manner.

Graf said the bank, which started in San Francisco, found it an easy decision to open a branch in Boulder.

“We’ve operated successfully in the Bay Area for 11 years and looked to expand our impact in an area that had a density of companies operating in our key impact areas,” she explained. “Colorado’s Front Range rose to the top of the list.”

Beth Jensen echoed the region’s importance in leading the way on sustainable principles.

“It’s pretty unique that this effort is globally-leading, and the epicenter of it is in Colorado.”

For many makers of outdoor products, sustainability is also driven by customer demand. The people giving them money are curious and values-driven themselves.

“Our customers are amazing,” said Nora Covington. “They’re educated and want options that are safe and effective, but that won’t wreck the planet.”

“It’s all rolled up in being a good citizen,” agreed Jensen. “I think the outdoor consumer is particularly informed and wants to tread as lightly on the environment as they can.”
