Jamie Lyn Tanner stands in the hemp plot on her family's farm near Gilcrest. Farmers large and small are hoping to cash in on rising demand for a wide variety of consumer and industrial products made from hemp.

Hemp on the range

BY DALLAS HELTZELL
news@bizwestmedia.com

For Jamie Lyn Tanner, raising a plot of hemp on her family farm was “almost a no-brainer.”

“I’ve spent most of my adult life researching how to be a better human, how to live while leaving as little footprint as possible,” said Tanner, 32, who with her mother farms 122 acres near Gilcrest, mostly planted in alfalfa. “When Mom and I heard that hemp was a possibility, it was something I wanted to do. I didn’t quite expect to be the journey it’s been.”

From Tanner’s still-tiny hemp plot to the nearly 2,500 acres planted this year near Eaton by operations such as Colorado Cultivars, hemp is booming — despite obstacles related to processing, perception and politics.

Nearly 6,000 acres of hemp will be harvested in Colorado this year, but the challenges to raising an industrial hemp crop indeed can be daunting, as it often remains mistaken for recreational and medicinal marijuana.

“I’m young, I’m a female, and I’m automatically questioned by the good ol’ boy network,” Tanner said. “When I first started, I had to prove that I knew how to farm, that I wasn’t just one of those potheads that called themselves a hemp farmer.”

Hemp is not pot. Both come from cannabis, but hemp is non-hallucinogenic. By state law, hemp can’t contain more than 0.3 percent THC, the chemical in cannabis that can produce a “high.” It’s bred instead for its fibers and oils, which backers such as Morris Beegle, owner of Loveland-based Colorado Hemp Co. and organizer of the annual Northern Colorado Hemp Expo, believes could pump billions of dollars into the economy.

“We want to show how it can be used in building materials, bioplastics, paper, foods, body-care products, nanoparticles, batteries, clothing and so much more. The hemp plant can be utilized in thousands of applications.” Proponents say certain micron-sized hemp dust can even be mixed with slurry injected into fracking wells, reducing the amount of chemicals that oil-and-gas companies have to pump into their drilling sites and filling cracks in drill walls.

Beegle’s hemp exposition started with a gathering at a 300-seat bar in Windsor in 2014. The next year, it moved to a 13,000-square-foot venue in an outbuilding near the Budweiser Event Center at The Ranch in Loveland and had 74 vendors. The third expo, last April, occupied 36,000 square feet and reached its capacity with 130 vendors, including such local firms as Loveland-based Elite Botanicals and Loveland Molecular Labs.

David Bonvillain, owner of those two companies, works both sides, raising and processing cannabis for industrial hemp as well as for medicinal and recreational products such as Mary’s Medicinals, Cheba Chews and Incredibles Edibles. He and his partners farm 30 to 40 acres on plots and greenhouses near Loveland, Berthoud and Longmont.

“In the marijuana space, the final product is the flower,” Bonvillain said, whereas industrial hemp requires processing such as “decortication” to strip the fibrous outer layers and stalks from the “hurd” or “shiv,” the soft inside, from where hemp oil can be extracted.

“There’s a lot of new farms thinking they’re going to make money but haven’t developed their processing partners,” Bonvillain said. “They’re banking on that in fall they’re going to make enough money to carry them through. Last year was stark reality.”

It certainly was for Tanner, who tried her hand at hemp on a fifth of an acre in 2014 — the first year it became legal to grow the crop in Colorado. Only about 200 acres were harvested statewide that year, after passage of state Senate Bill 13-241, which set up guidelines for an industrial-hemp system.

“I put my first hemp crop right out by the road where everybody could see it,” Tanner said, "but I forgot I couldn't get water there."

Tanner seeded a half-acre last year but said she ended up with "a beautiful crop of weeds because I second-guessed myself. I planted too late. We needed to hit the right time windows, and I spent far too many man-hours. Next year it'll be mechanized, not hoes and rakes.

"I didn't even intend to have a crop this year, but my volunteers are awesome! This seed multiplies at such an amazing rate," she said. "So I put in two acres this year. I've had an opportunity to work with a company that makes hemp cookies and hemp ice cream. His genetics are far ahead of anything I've even verified yet."

Processing remains the biggest hurdle for small farmers, said Jason Lauve, founder of Lakewood-based Hemp Cleans.

"Processing is the largest needed component to making hemp a viable resource in America," he said. "Fiber is the most difficult to process, and it needs special machinery to produce a high-quality material for the non-woven materials markets."

Lauve said he is "responsible for rescuing the last Diamond Tobacco hemp fiber/kenaf decorticator in America and convincing a company to install the line in North Carolina, even before the hemp law was created there."

The Colorado Department of Agriculture "has been very supportive," Lauve said. "They have certified a seed that should be harvested any day now." Testing at Colorado State University has found that "this year's crop is doing a little better than last year," he said.

"One of the things we learned early on is that planting early and getting ahead of the weeds is critical," Lauve said. "Hemp creates a shade canopy that kills weeds, so you don't need herbicides."

Morris Beegle,
owner of Loveland-based Colorado Hemp Co.

Hemp advocates also say more clarity is needed to end what Beegle called "federal fuzziness." The Controlled Substances Act of 1970 designated all forms of cannabis, including hemp, as Schedule I controlled substances, but the Farm Bill of 2014 included a provision letting states conduct hemp research and cultivation. An Industrial Hemp Farming Act was introduced in both houses of Congress in 2015, but no action has yet been taken.

"Congress just needs to act and do the legislation that separates hemp out from the marijuana side," Beegle said. "At that point, the floodgates will be opened. We've got more latitude here than the rest of the country, but until then, the industry will just hobble along."

"We need to get past that part to get some economic confidence, investor confidence, behind hemp," Lauve added. "The money's there. The interest is there. We need to present the proper business plan, a financial outlook for five years, employment increase — not just a 10-page sheet with pictures."

From the largest concerns to small farmers such as Tanner, the hope for hemp remains in full bloom.

"I want to see the grain belt turn into a hemp belt," Tanner said. "The industry will drive itself. There's so much money to be made. Just put it in right to begin with and you'll have a beautiful crop — and then make sure you're got a plan for where you're taking it.

"Marketing, product development — I'm seeing stuff this year I didn't expect to happen for many years," she said. "A lot more people are going to jump in. I'm shocked at how fast this is all happening. The momentum's already gained. The ball's rolling and they can't stop it. I hope those are true words."
