Other industries get publicity, but agribusiness chugs along

A letter from Co-publishers Chris Wood and Jeff Nuttall

In a region where high technology, biotechnology, distribution, energy and many other sectors get much of the attention, agribusiness remains one of the dominant sectors of the Northern Colorado economy.

Agriculture drives our economy, not only through the planting and harvesting of crops but also the processing and distribution of foodstuffs, and spinoff spending for agricultural equipment. Agribusinesses employ thousands of workers, each of whom helps to drive the real estate, retail and service economies as well.

Add in a rapidly growing ethanol industry, driven by a push for renewable energy, and one gets a feel for the importance of this sector to the Northern Colorado economy.

Harvest, a directory prepared by the staff of the Northern Colorado Business Report, includes analyses of the latest trends in the region's agribusiness/agricultural sector, as well as about 1,200 listings of ag-oriented companies. Data collected includes name, address, phone, fax, e-mail, Web site, revenues, number of employees, year founded, products and services, and more.

Once again, we've provided some key agricultural statistics that help demonstrate the importance of agribusiness to Larimer and Weld counties. Articles prepared by our staff and freelancers help to round out the publication.

In all, it's a wealth of information, crammed into a few dozen pages. We'd like to particularly thank our research staff, including Kathleen Chaballa and Kate Hendrickson, who spent many hours on this project, both in updating existing records and in ferreting out those new companies that should be included.

A research project of this magnitude inevitably will include errors and omissions, though we strive to keep those to a minimum. If you spot something incomplete with your company's listing, or if you know of a company that was omitted, please contact our research team at (970) 221-5400, ext. 227, to let them know. You can also reach them at research@ncbr.com.

Contents of this directory are available on CD-ROM in Microsoft Excel or tab-delimited formats. Or go online to www.ncbr.com to download this and other databases using our DataBank system. Additional print copies of the directory are available at local chambers of commerce and economic-development agencies, as well as at our office.

We'd like to thank our cover sponsors, Bi-State Machinery Co. Inc. and the Greeley Stampede.

Finally, watch for our other directories during the course of the year.

In the meantime, enjoy this edition of Harvest!

Sorghum outstanding in its field

Often-overlooked crop gains higher profile with state's farmers

By Steve Porter, sporter@ncbr.com

Organic farming is one of the fastest-growing sectors of agriculture in the United States. Although organic farming accounts for only 2 percent of total agriculture in this country, this area of cultivation grew 20 percent last year and is expected to continue to expand.

In Colorado, it's almost considered a "poor cousin" to corn.

But like corn, sorghum — sometimes called milo — is finding new markets and new income possibilities for Colorado farmers looking for crops that can do well in the state's often-harsh growing season.

Some growers in the state are already well aware of sorghum's role as a good rotation crop — particularly for wheat — and as a reliable cash staple for decades.

"They've been growing sorghum around here since the 1930s," said Burl Scherler, a sorghum grower in Kiowa County in southeast Colorado. "It's a good dryland crop, real dependable."

Sorghum and corn are both members of the grass family, similar in appearance up to a point in their development, with both having large, grassy leaves. But sorghum doesn't put out ears or grow as tall as its more popular relative, instead developing a berry cluster "head" that's processed for its food and fuel properties.

Sorghum has a number of attributes that are raising its profile in fields across the state. With Eastern Colorado in the grip of an ongoing drought, sorghum's affinity for heat and need for less water than corn is making it look more attractive to farmers who don't have access to irrigation or can't afford it.

"It's a much harder crop," says Scherler. "It takes 6.9 inches of rain to get the first bushel of milo compared to 11 inches of rain to get the first bushel of corn."

Scherler said studies have shown that, on 15 inches of rain, 82 bushels of sorghum can be raised on the same acre that would grow 55 bushels of corn or 25 bushels of wheat.

Farmers across the southern United States, from New Mexico to Delaware, have been growing sorghum for livestock feed, bird seed, pet food and a variety of human foods, including sorghum meal and flour, granola, dry snack cakes, cereals and other products.

Because grain sorghum does not contain the same gluten as wheat, it can replace wheat as baking flour for people who need a wheat gluten-free diet. And sorghum has been found to possess antioxidants that protect against cell damage from free radicals, according to

How much sorghum?

Northern Colorado's total sorghum production in 2005 accounted for less than 5 percent of the state's total:

In addition, sorghum has fewer calories and less fat than corn while containing more protein. Sorghum's dry matter has also been used by Archer Daniels Midland in the production of wallboard for the housing industry and in biodegradable packaging.

New product breakthrough

But new uses for sorghum in recent years show even more promise for the often overlooked and under-promoted crop. A major breakthrough may lie in ethanol production, particularly in Kansas, the epicenter of U.S. sorghum research and harvests.

In 2005, Kansas had eight sorghum ethanol production plants and three more proposed. With Kansas State University leading the way on sorghum research, Kansas had 15 counties producing between 4 million and 6 million bushels of sorghum each.

Compare that to Colorado, where the largest sorghum-growing county in 2005 — Baca County in extreme southeast Colorado — grew 1.2 million bushels.

According to the National Sorghum Producers' Web site, "Sorghum and corn are interchangeable in the making of ethanol and yield approximately the same amount of ethanol per bushel."

Sorghum is even finding its way into America's favorite beverage — beer. In late December 2006, Anheuser-Busch announced the release of Redbridge, a new sorghum beer aimed at beer drinkers who are allergic to wheat or gluten. Redbridge is the first nationally available sorghum beer, although sorghum beers have been brewed internationally for years and have long been popular in many African countries, according to A-B.

"We've made Redbridge nationally available to make sure adults who experience wheat allergies or who choose a gluten-free diet can enjoy the kind of beer that fits their lifestyle," said Angie Minges, A-B's product manager.

Some sorghum is grown in Northern Colorado but not much compared to corn, wheat and other crops. In 2005, only 16,000 bushels were harvested in Weld County, and none in Larimer County. Adams County grew the most, harvesting about 60,000 bushels that year.

But with emerging uses for sorghum, Colorado's sorghum producers are in the process of creating a statewide sorghum growers association. Darrell Hanavan, director of the Colorado Wheat Association, said members of his association are spearheading the move because they often plant sorghum as a rotation crop for wheat.

Hanavan said having a state sorghum association will help Colorado growers promote the crop in the future. "They're looking at a national check-off for funds dedicated to research and promotion of sorghum," he said. "The 2007 Farm Bill needs representation for sorghum and without a state association we'd have less impact with our Colorado Congressional delegation."

Hanavan said he's hoping a sorghum association can be created "within the next several months," in time for producers to get support for sorghum research and production into the federal omnibus Farm Bill.

Cattle prices going down as cost of corn goes up

Culling from drought, demand from ethanol pressuring producers

By Kim Lock, news@ncbr.com

In addition to continuing drought punctuated by the punishing blizzards that ended 2006, Colorado cattle producers are enduring a perfect storm in the marketplace: Prices paid to producers are depressed while the prices producers pay for inputs like corn are racing upward because of competition for corn from ethanol producers.

Ranchers, feedlot operators and cow-calf producers are currently receiving declining prices for their cattle at the slaughterhouse because of an abundant supply. The cattle cycle tends to span a 10- to 12-year period, fueled by consumer demand, herd supply and rebuilding time.

"Feeder and calf prices are now lower than in the past couple of years," said Kevin Good, senior market analyst for Cattle-Fax in Englewood. "The price is better than in 2002 when supply was flooded from the drought, but in '03, '04 and '05 the prices were higher, on the top side of the range. Currently, prices are drifting lower nationally because of a larger supply and higher corn costs."

According to the Livestock Marketing Information Center in Lakewood, "Federally Inspected (FI) cow slaughter in 2006 has been well above a year ago as drought conditions this summer and fall forced many cow-calf producers to increase culling rates. In addition, dairy cow slaughter has also been above a year ago due to rising input costs and milk prices well below a year ago."

This additional or earlier culling leads to a surplus of boxed beef and depresses prices even when the domestic demand for consumer beef remains strong.

"The year-to-date price of general fed cattle in '06 is currently $85.50 per hundredweight and last year at this time it was $87.50 per hundredweight," Cattle-Fax's Good said.

"The main driver leading to lower prices has been the escalating price of corn, which is now at $1.50 a bushel," he said. "The competition from ethanol plants for corn has softened the profits that producers earn."

Ethanol competes for corn

Ethanol in Colorado is in a gearing-up period. The state is currently home to three ethanol plants with an additional two in the works, even though it is widely regarded as a "corn-deficit state." That means corn is brought into Colorado by rail lines from the Midwest to partially feed the need of the plants.

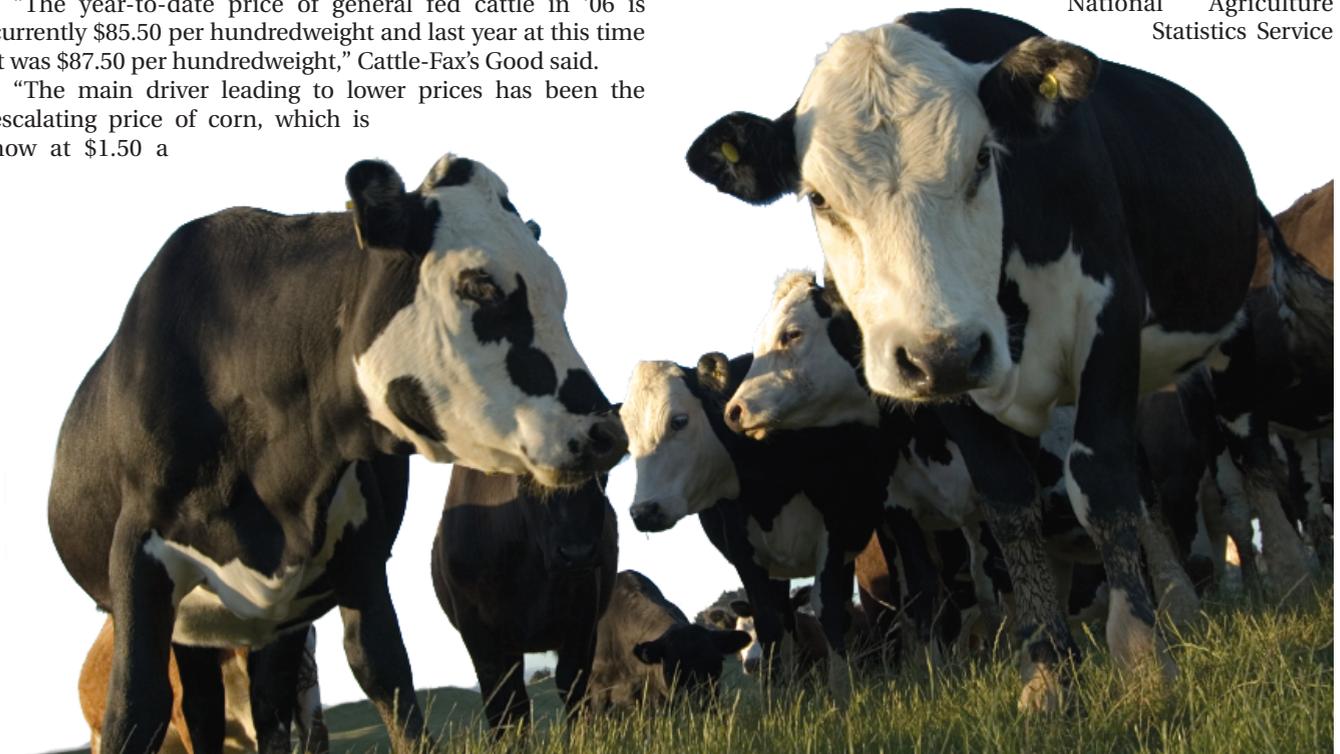

The corn-deficit status is not necessarily a detriment to the local ethanol industry, because the plants are within a close proximity to the final consumer. The state's ethanol plants are located in Windsor, Golden and Sterling, and planned in LaSalle and Yuma.

But by raising the price of corn locally, the plants have created an unfair marketplace, according to Terry Fankhauser, executive vice president of the Colorado Cattlemen's Association.

"We welcome the plants and think that the renewable energy they provide is great, but we are not going to shy away from informing the public that they don't operate in a free and open market system," he said. "Most every other commodity is sold on a level playing field which is fair for competition, but ethanol is different. The crops are subsidized and the plants are subsidized."

The additional demand has yet to filter down to supply, another factor in the expense of corn. According to the U.S.

Department of Agriculture's
National Agriculture
Statistics Service

in 2005 Colorado farmers planted 110 thousand acres of corn for silage, the same acreage as in 2000. Cattle producers are hopeful that the increased price will entice farmers to plant additional acreage in 2007.

To compensate for increased corn prices, cattle producers can feed a percentage of the ethanol waste product, known as distiller's grain, to their cattle. But producers can't feed the distiller's grain in the same way as fresh corn because it affects the quality of grade of meat. It also increases the deposits of sulfur in the manure, which has environmental impact.

Distiller's grain can be dried, which significantly increases its cost, or fed wet. "The (wet) distiller's grain can't be shipped because it spoils after a week," Fankhauser said, "so producers have to be close to a plant to utilize the grain."

Cattle prices depressed nationally

The ethanol plant in Yuma, expected to open this year, will directly affect Kenny Rogers, president-elect of the Colorado Cattlemen's Association. Rogers plans on feeding cattle on his Yuma ranch with less than 30 percent of distiller's grain and will supplement the rest of his feed needs with corn and hay.

"Corn is extensively used to feed and finish cattle, and it is up 30 percent this year," Rogers said. "It has gained a dollar a bushel ... it just costs more to feed them in an industry where margins are already razor thin."

The trend of depressed cattle prices is not limited to Colorado. A high supply nationally is also applying a downward pressure on prices.

"Packers have cut their production and they will ramp back

"Currently prices are drifting lower nationally because of a larger supply and higher corn costs."

— Kevin Good,
senior market analyst

up when fed cattle returns to profitability," said Keith Belk, professor of animal science at Colorado State University in Fort Collins. "The top five packers are bleeding — they are not profitable. Cargill seems to be doing the best."

Belk said the domestic consumer market remains strong, but cheaper proteins like chicken and pork are preventing the market from consuming the excess supply. The boxed meat market supply also remains high due to the continued closure of the Korean market and the decreased demand of the Japanese market.

"The feeders are going to have a tough year, unless they have forward contracts," he said.

Water case could decide ag future

Shut-down well owners hope judge will approve plan

By Steve Porter, sporter@ncbr.com

GREELEY — The Central Colorado Water Conservancy District in Greeley and several hundred well owners it represents are hoping a water court judge this spring will approve a proposed plan to replenish water they've been pumping from the South Platte River basin for decades.

A decision in Central's favor could mean that Weld, Adams and Morgan county wells shut down by the state engineer in May 2006 would be allowed to pump again for the 2007 irrigation season. A decision against the district could result in many of those farmers and ranchers being severely hurt economically or possibly forced out of business.

"It's a very serious issue because it's dealing with people's livelihoods," said Tom Cech, CCWCD director.

On the other side of the matter before Division 1 Water Court Judge Roger Klein are 35 cities, irrigation and ditch companies, water associations and sanitation districts spread along the South Platte River basin from Boulder to Sterling who claim that allowing the well owners to pump again could jeopardize their ability to serve their residents and clients now and into the future.

"If they're going to pump they'll have an impact on the river, and the people who have senior rights should not be impacted by their pumping," said Dan Brown, an attorney representing Cache la Poudre Water Users Association and others concerned about the augmentation plan.

A scheduled 30-day trial before Judge Klein is set to begin in the Weld County Courthouse in Greeley on Feb. 5.

The CCWCD's Water Augmentation District, along with the South Platte Well Users Association, have proposed a multi-pronged augmentation plan that includes spending more than $9 million to purchase senior water rights, lease water, develop groundwater recharge projects and line gravel pits to serve as storage reservoirs — all designed to persuade Judge Klein they have acquired enough water to replenish that removed by member well owners.

Senior v. junior rights

Many of those opposed to Central's plan, called "objectors" in the court filing, have "senior" water rights in the South Platte basin filed before 1900, which under Colorado law means they have first claim to all of the water rights they hold. The well owners are farmers and ranchers who drilled wells in the 1930s and 1950s to supplement their water supplies in dry years. Those rights are considered "junior" to those with senior rights and are generally viewed as subordinate when they come in conflict.

Cech said the water confrontation between the two groups began to take shape in the last few years as a continuing drought began to grip Northern Colorado. "The drought definitely brought it to a head, along with the Empire Lodge ruling which said the state engineer could no longer approve pumping on an out-of-priority basis," he said.

In 2002, the Colorado Supreme Court ruled in the case known as Empire Lodge v. Moyers that the Empire Lodge Homeowners Association could not divert water out-of-priority without first obtaining an augmentation plan decree from water court.

Such a decree is what Central is seeking from the court. "We have to prove we have replacement water to put back in the South Platte River at the right time and the right place and in the right quantity," Cech said.

The district even went so far as to persuade its well owners last summer to agree to limit their pumping to one well in 2007

— many had two or more — to further encourage Judge Klein to rule in their favor.

“That was a very difficult decision for the well owners and the district,” Cech said.

Brown said for his clients the trial is not about preventing well owners to pump or an attempt to injure the region’s agriculture. “Our goal is definitely not to stop this (proposed) plan but to make sure it functions and that they have enough water in their augmentation plan to replace what’s removed,” he said.

Both sides agree that, whatever decision is rendered, it will likely be precedent-setting for the often-parched West.

“There’s a lot of aspects that will have legal implications for other augmentation plans,” Brown said.

Cech said a focal point of the case is to “integrate surface and groundwater (rights) in the same legal system, which has not been done with much success in other Western states.”

“I believe this is the biggest augmentation case to be heard in water court in Colorado history,” he said. “Absolutely, it will be a precedent-setting case and one for the history books.”

Business is not for the faint of heart.

To make it takes more than a strong constitution. It takes knowledge—from in-depth analysis, timely information, relevant data, and direct interaction.

Only one local and regional source delivers all that. Through print, e-mail, web, conferences and networking. We have what you need to succeed, and to keep your hair loss to a minimum.
