Boulder Valley, Northern Colorado raise profiles in technology sector

Our regions seem to have it all: stunning natural beauty, fantastic quality of life, dynamic economies. It's the latter description that would have been difficult to utter just a few years ago, when residential foreclosures and job losses were the norm at many major employers.

But “dynamic” is indeed an apt descriptor for the Boulder Valley and Northern Colorado economies, and one sector that has remained strong even through the past downturn is technology.

Tech companies continue to grow, and innovation erupts not only from young startups but also from established Fortune 100 companies, the universities and federal laboratories. Colorado State University in Fort Collins and the University of Colorado in Boulder helped spawn our tech economy, and their importance grows by the day.

We also benefit from accelerators such as the Boulder-based TechStars, and organizations that help take discoveries from the laboratory to the marketplace, such as the Rocky Mountain Innosphere and the Innovation Center of the Rockies.

weekly business journals, the Boulder County Business Report and the Northern Colorado Business Report — serves as an excellent resource for anyone interested in the rapidly changing tech sector of Boulder, Broomfield, Larimer and Weld counties.

This publication lists thousands of tech and manufacturing companies in those counties, along with articles focusing on the key sub-industries that make technology a major driver our the Front Range economy.

We would like to offer special thanks to our research director, Mariah Gant, for her hard work surveying companies for this publication. Thank you also to the many advertisers who want to reach the technology scene, and to the entire staff of BizWest Media for their efforts.

Final frontier creating tantalizing market for area firms

COURTESY SIERRA NEVADA CORP.

by Michael Davidson | mdavidson@bcbr.com

Whether the mission is helping America return to pre-eminence in manned spaceflight, sending commercial trips to the moon or protecting the planet from a catastrophic collision with an asteroid, companies in the Boulder Valley are keeping the dream alive.

The Boulder-area is home to the offices of a number of important aerospace companies, including industry giants Lockheed Martin and Northrup Grumman. But the most interesting activity is taking place in companies focused on sending astronauts and satellites into space. Companies in the area especially are active in commercial spaceflight, a potentially fast-growing segment of the market now that NASA has stopped manned missions.

The Dream Chaser cleared one milestone in May, when a helicopter carried it over Boulder and Broomfield counties in a "captive carry" test to demonstrate the vehicle's airworthiness. The test took it over the Boulder's Scott Carpenter Park, in honor of the 50th anniversary of the Boulderite's spaceflight.

One of the marquee projects is the Dream Chaser, a spacecraft being developed by Sierra Nevada Corp. in Louisville.

The Dream Chaser's purpose is to carry astronauts, cargo and equipment on missions into low-earth orbit and to the International Space Station. The Dream Chaser will be much like the now-retired space shuttles, as they will take off on a rocket, land like a plane and will be reusable.

The Dream Chaser will be smaller — for example, it will lack the shuttle's giant cargo bay used for taking satellites into orbit — but it shares a kinship with NASA's workhorse.

"We're the emotional and symbolic successor to the space shuttle. We look like it, we fly like it. We're a lot smaller, but the mission is different," said Mark Sirangelo, corporate vice president and head of Sierra Nevada Corp. Space Systems.

The Dream Chaser and the space shuttle programs differ in another major way. While space shuttles were owned and operated by NASA, the Dream Chaser is a private program. NASA, civilian and military agencies and commercial customers would be SNC's clients.

SNC, a privately held company based in Sparks, Nevada, will not disclose what it has invested in the Dream Chaser, but it is north of $100 million, Sirangelo said. The total price to get a fully operational vehicle in space will be hundreds of millions.

SNC has a partner in NASA, which has set up programs to encourage private aerospace companies to build new spacecraft and rockets as the agency reconfigures its mission. NASA has committed around $330 million to Dream Chaser, provided it can hit milestones established by the agency and company.

The Dream Chaser cleared one milestone in May, when a helicopter carried it over Boulder and Broomfield counties in a "captive carry" test to demonstrate the vehicle's airworthiness. The test took it over the Boulder's Scott Carpenter Park, in honor of the 50th anniversary of the Boulderite's spaceflight.

The Dream Chaser soon will be shipped to Edwards Air Force Base in California for further flight testing.

Patriotism helps drive the nearly 150 local employees working on Dream Chaser in Louisville. They believe the United States should be the leader of and reap the benefits from space exploration.

"Right now, the U.S. doesn't have a way to take humans into space," Sirangelo said. The United States instead books flights on Russian-built and operated rockets.

"It's a very expensive proposition, and it puts money and jobs in Russia, not here."

And here could mean right here, in Colorado.

"We could be the home, not only symbolically but actually, of America's spaceflight program," Sirangelo said.

Sierra Nevada Corp. isn't alone in trying to get a foothold in the new space race. In fact, it is not even the most ambitious.

Moon trips

On Dec. 6, Boulder-based startup Golden Spike Co. announced it has plans to build a lunar lander and begin flying commercial missions to the moon by 2020.

The private project will be expensive. Golden Spike projected it will cost between $7 billion and $8 billion to get the first mission to the moon. Subsequent "turn-key human expeditions" will cost between $1.4 billion and $1.6 billion.

Golden Spike is led by president and chief executive Alan Stern, former chief of NASA's space and earth science programs. The

“We could be the home, not only symbolically but actually, of America's spaceflight program.”

MARK SIRANGELO

corporate vice president,
Sierra Nevada Corp. Space Systems company has spent the past two years putting together a business model and assembling what Stern calls a "dream team" of NASA and aerospace veterans.

Golden Spike has not disclosed its financial backers or gone into depth publicly about how it will cover startup costs, but Stern is adamant the technical and financial models are sound.

The company's forecast believes there is sufficient demand for 20 to 30 lunar missions by 2030. Stern said 15 to 25 nations are interested in missions, and the company expects a $20 billion to $30 billion market for lunar expeditions.

"We're excited about bringing human exploration of other worlds to the forefront, and we're excited to be doing it in Colorado," Stern said.

Tracking asteroids

Meanwhile, Boulder-based Ball Aerospace and Technologies Corp. is doing the humdrum work of developing satellites and sensors that could detect asteroids on a collision course with earth.

Ball is working with a nonprofit named the B612 Foundation to develop a satellite named the Sentinel that would give scientists an early warning about potential strikes, said Carl Gelderloos, director of new business operations for civil and operational space.

Ball will build the satellite and important sensors on the Sentinel. The satellite would be launched into a Venus-like orbit, where it would create a map of the inner solar system and be able to find objects about 10 meters across.

Those asteroids are "the smaller things that would be incredibly devastating, but not necessarily civilization ending. ... The types that could collide with the earth and cause catastrophic damage," Gelderloos said.

The goal is to launch the Sentinel in 2016, and B612 is trying to raise money. If it launches, the foundation says it will be the first ever privately funded deep space mission, and B612's approach is a completely new way of getting into space.

"The idea of doing a philanthropic mission for the benefit of mankind is a really new idea," Gelderloos said.

The Sentinel would be built in Boulder, and its operational center would be at the University of Colorado.

If the companies fulfill their ambitions, the Boulder area could reap financial rewards. Needless to say, it would gain the area a place in history.

At the very least, it could reawaken a passion for space exploration that has diminished.

"There's magic here. We're trying to rekindle the spark and get people interested again," Sirangelo said.

Out of the laboratory, into the marketplace

COURTESY SOLIX BIOSYSTEMS INC.

Solix BioSystems Inc. in Fort Collins converts algae into biomass fuels in photobioreactors, which, in a sense, are large pools. It also markets its biomass as a product that is rich in protein and carbohydrates and has the potential as a source for various food ingredients or as an animal feed or for aquaculture.

by Dan Cook | news@ncbr.com

It has been a wild ride for biofuels-focused Solix BioSystems Inc. But since bubbling up from the Engines and Energy Conversion Laboratory at Colorado State University, Solix has kept moving forward despite the gyrations of the biofuels industry.

Solix started out with two basic product lines: It designed systems called photobioreactors — large pools, in a sense — for growing algae on an industrial scale, and it produced an algae-based biomass that can be converted into a wide range of biofuels for vehicles and airplanes.

As promising as that sounds, it's not easy to build a profitable business around either or both of these products, yet. And so Solix nowadays is marketing its biomass more aggressively, seeking customers for higher grade products than biofuels. Because its biomass is rich in protein and carbohydrates, it has the potential as a source for various food ingredients or as an animal feed or for aquaculture.

Think nutraceuticals, such as Omega-3, pharmaceuticals and specialty chemicals.

Algae are photosynthetic organisms that have been on Earth for millions of years.

Solix traces its founding to EECL director Bryan Willson. It is one of two companies — the other being EnviroFit International — launched by Willson and his team that have made it out of the lab.

The company is now moving off the CSU campus and into new digs on Vine Drive in Fort Collins.

Like EnviroFit, which has shifted its save-the-planet emphasis without abandoning it, Solix has survived partly by keeping its options open.

When it was launched in 2006, biofuels appeared to be close to moving from a “craft” fuel status to a true alternative to petroleum-based energy. World events conspired against the nascent industry, however, with funding presenting an obstacle to startups in the field amid falling natural gas prices.

Still, Solix in large part has stuck to its initial business plan, said chief operating officer Richard Schoonover: “Focus on the development of systems for the liquid fuels market,” and to be a vendor of the end products.

But, he said, it couldn’t stop there.

“Bridging the gap between pilot-scale facilities and the first commercial plant capable of producing enough product to enter the transportation fuels market, in any meaningful fashion, is difficult at best because of the magnitude of capital required,” Schoonover said.

So Solix shifted its emphasis, because, after all, a revenue stream is a revenue stream for a startup. Solix now believes it can sell both its technology for large-scale producers (as they come along) as well as the biomass fuel it produces, along with its new natural byproducts line.

The early biofuels players who stuck to one niche have mostly gone away. The survivors have been agile, adaptable, opportunistic — and well-funded. Solix has raised $66 million in six years, and closed its C round in August, a $31 million shot in the arm that will help it move into the byproduct realm. As noted by Schoonover, the market for its patented algae-to-fuel technology has been slow to develop, but the demand for biofuel products remains constant.

These byproducts have higher profit margins than basic biofuels and have shown promise.

When Solix emerged from the EECL, the biofuels industry was gathering momentum, albeit with a wavering direction, and commercial markets were emerging for its products. It recruited Joel Butler from his Silicon Valley career base in 2009 as vice president for research and development, to bring his commercialization and marketing experience to bear on Solix’s products. With an earlier, $16 million B-round of funding at his disposal, Butler had intended to market the company’s algae-growing systems hard. But buyers were harder to find. That’s why, again, Solix shifted focus to the algae-based products themselves.

It’s tough to make a living selling low-end biofuel on a large scale, given the production costs involved in making the stuff from algae. But higher-end products reward the vendor with higher margins, and Solix was discovering that its production system was capable of delivering the craft biofuel products along with the low-end type.

When it sought new cash last summer, the pitch was simple: Invest in us, and we’ll serve the complete range of customers for biofuel products.

The investment firm 12BF Global Ventures waxed enthusiastically about its stake in the “new” Solix.

“We are thrilled to be part of Solix’s transition,” David Wasserstein, director of investments at 12BF and a board member at Solix, said. “The biofuels sector will reward those than can both achieve scale and serve multiple markets with their products.”

Energy experts have been predicting the busting out of biofuels for years, and it does appear that many of the primary requirements for its scalability — large-scale R&D, startup funding, industry critical mass, crucial cost triggers of petroleum-based fuels, concern about global warming — may now be in biofuels’ favor.

Whether they truly are remains to be seen.

Area holds right prescription for booming industry

Evaldas Katilius, a senior scientist at SomaLogic Inc., prepares samples for testing a potential enhancement of the company's biomarker technology. SomaLogic has been researching protein biomarkers in the blood for the past 23 years.

by Beth Potter | bpotter@bcbr.com

Imagine there's a test that can tell you if you're going to have a heart attack in the near future.

A group of Boulder researchers at MiRagen Therapeutics Inc. do research that could lead to just such a test. They have found that heightened levels of the molecule they have named MIR-208 in the blood can lead to heart damage and heart failure, said Bill Marshall, chief executive officer and a founder of the company.

The researchers came up with test information as they worked on creating a new heart disease treatment drug. They set up studies to monitor microRNA variations in blood, based on the drug treatment, Marshall said. Other research from around the United States shows that changes in microRNAs in the blood can be correlated with the severity of a variety of diseases, he said.

"This piqued our interest," Marshall said. "We have been able to find several (microRNAs) that are altered in the bloodstream ... that appeared to be indicative of further worsening of the disease."

Since coronary heart disease is the leading cause of death in the United States, the research could lead to big sales after it goes through an approval process with the Food and Drug Administration. A biomarker is any biological measurement that can be used to indicate something about your body. It can be simple, such as your height, or complex, such as the molecule in question found in your blood.

MiRagen plans to focus on drug treatment rather than microRNA tests, however, Marshall said. In the future, MiRagen may partner with Boulder bioscience company SomaLogic Inc. or another diagnostic company in the region to develop the test, he said.

"It's a win-win scenario, since a lot of the research we do guides us in how the drug is working," Marshall said. "It's advantageous in identifying markers so that we can target therapeutic agents. The early work is to identify the important biomarkers.”

MiRagen is one of several local companies that are considered leaders in the global biomarker research field. SomaLogic, which researches proteins, is considered a forerunner in the field. Boulder diagnostic company Bodesix Inc. is another player, as is TeraBAT Inc. in Longmont.

“The field is just booming, as people are using these new tools to try to understand how to improve medicine,” said David Brunel, a founder of Bodesix. “I think it’s one of the big growth areas in biotechnology in the next decade.”

As the cost of health care continues to rise, the diagnostic market gets ever more important, Brunel said. He estimated the worldwide market for diagnostic products at $5 billion. A clinician may take weeks or months to diagnose a disease for, example, but new blood tests may be able to give results in days, according to Brunel. Bodesix researchers are developing the VeriStrat diagnostic lung cancer test.

While the biomarker field is getting attention from others in the health-care industry these days, SomaLogic Inc. has been researching protein biomarkers in the blood for the past 23 years, said company founder Larry Gold. SomaLogic now partners with national pharmaceutical players such as Novartis International AG (NYSE: NVS in the United States) and Quest Diagnostics Inc. (NYSE: DGX) to develop its products.

Now that the company is close to having marketable products, “it’s an exciting time,” Gold said.

“We are fortunate to have done something that no one else has been able to do — to measure precisely and quantitatively, proteins in a way that nobody else can do,” Gold said. “I think everyone believes we’re on the leading edge of it, and it’s so much fun to be there.”

The field also includes biomarkers found in exhaled breath, said Eyal Gerecht, a founder of TeraBAT Inc. in Longmont, which does research on the heart disease biomarkers found in exhaled breath. TeraBAT is competing with companies across the nation to come up with technology that patients can breathe into in every emergency room and every drugstore in the future, Gerecht said.

Jack Wheeler, TeraBAT’s chief business officer, points to Gold as the impetus for the region’s reputation as a biomarker research hub. So does Brunel, who worked with Gold to license the rights to the original University of Colorado-Boulder research to start SomaLogic.

“SomaLogic now is probably leading the industry,” Brunel said. “It’s one thing to be able to measure something. To do it reliably and produce it day in and day out takes a lot of work.”

MicroRNAs and proteins aren’t the only potential biomarkers being researched in the human body, however, Marshall said. Local and national researchers also look at the changes in peptides and metabolites to try to come up with new products, he said.

“At the end of the day, our goal is to create human therapeutics that change the course of these difficult-to-treat diseases,” Marshall said. “It’s treating the right patient at the right time with the right medicine.”

UQM on road to electrifying transportation

UQM Technologies Inc. manufactures electric motor systems at its manufacturing plant east of Longmont.

JONATHAN CASTNER

by Dan Cook | news@ncbr.com

UQM Technologies Inc. has been working to segue from boutique electric-vehicle research lab and supplier to a major player during the past few years. It made one of its most significant leaps in that direction in October.

On Oct. 2, the Longmont-based maker of electric motors and related products announced it had signed a memorandum of understanding with a major Chinese company to produce electric propulsion systems for what are known as New Energy Vehicles.

Some potentially huge numbers are involved:

“The China State Council published its New Energy Vehicles plan in July, setting a goal of 500,000 energy-efficient and clean vehicles on the road in China by 2015, and 5 million vehicles by 2020,” the company said in a news release announcing the deal.

With its deal with the Chinese, UQM now claims strategic partnerships on four continents — the others being North and South America and Europe.

Compared with a lot of corporate makeovers, UQM is barreling ahead with its own, thanks in large part to alliances that have delivered the volumes it was seeking.

President and chief executive Eric Ridenour, who joined the company in fall 2010, said the wheels already were in motion for UQM’s transformation when he arrived on the scene.

“We were well known even globally in high-tech circles, mostly as a boutique producer,” Ridenour said. “But we had the foundation to be a high-volume producer, and a strategy was being created before I came aboard to make that happen.”

UQM, founded more than three decades ago, spent years developing new technologies and products, mostly funded through government grants and partnerships aimed at identifying ever more efficient and powerful electrical propulsion systems for electric vehicles.

Ridenour’s decision to join UQM was critical to CEO Bill Rankin’s plans to take UQM to a larger playing field. At 67, Rankin was looking for a successor. High on his list of priorities was to find someone with major-league automotive industry experience.

Ridenour fit the bill. He had cut his teeth in the automotive industry in Detroit, capping a long engineering career at Chrysler by being named to the board of Daimler Chrysler. He retired from Chrysler five years ago but wasn’t done working. Rather, he began to cast about for a new challenge.

“I wanted to work with a real product,” he said. “I wanted to go somewhere where I could make a difference in three to five years.”

Matchmakers brought the parties together. Ridenour liked what he saw. UQM was a leading-edge motor designer and manufacturer with a strong reputation in the industry. It was publicly held and solidly financed. Most important, UQM’s team had bigger ambitions.

“High-volume manufacturing was much more attractive to them at the time, and I knew what it took to be there,” Ridenour said. “It’s all about knowing where you want to be in the end, and then knowing how to get to that point. All these things are natural in the auto industry.”

Essentially, UQM is using a tried-and-true strategy to accelerate its growth: partnerships. Where once partnerships were designed to test the limits of electric-motor technology, they are now being forged so that UQM can crank up its manufacturing capabilities in Colorado.

The first major step came just as Ridenour arrived in 2010. UQM signed a 10-year agreement with the California vehicle maker CODA to produce motors for fleet vehicles. CODA’s first vehicles hit the market in March, powered by UQM motors. CODA also has a production agreement with a major Chinese auto company to develop electric vehicles for the Chinese market — vehicles that likely will be powered by UQM.

Other volume production partnerships followed as Ridenour built his own team, cherry-picking other former Motor City executives such as himself and putting them in charge of sales, marketing and production. Among its partners: Audi, as supplier of motors for its electric-vehicle test fleet; Rolls Royce, as supplier for a development program; Toyota, for a bus project; Truck maker EVI (Electric Vehicles International), as supplier of motors for a test-product project; and Proterra, a bus builder, as an electric propulsion-system supplier.

Sometimes, these partnerships are formal. Other times, they’re not.

“Today there are so many different kinds of strategic relationships,” Ridenour said. “Everything in China is a joint venture. We have a relationship with Borg Warner where we tout each other’s products, but there’s no written agreement. If someone is talking about transmission for electric vehicles, we recommend theirs. And they may recommend our motors if someone is looking for a quality system.

“A lot of those kinds of things could happen when you look for the ways you can grow. We want access to new customers. We want to build volume. If we can gain that through a relationship, it’s a good thing, as long as we retain our IP, so that’s what we’re looking for: new customers, growth of our business and retaining our IP. If a partnership offers that, we’re interested.”

While UQM (NYSE: UQM) has lost money in recent years, its financials are improving.

In the quarter that ended June 30, revenue showed strong quarter-to-quarter growth ($2.3 million compared with $1.3 million in the previous similar period) and per-share losses held steady quarter-to-quarter, a loss of 4 cents per share vs. a loss of 3 cents in the previous period.

With the deal with the Chinese agreement and CODA sales expanding, UQM appears well on its way to putting its boutique research-and-development-shop image in the rearview mirror.

Entrepreneurial itch

leads to ethanol production

by Dan Cook | news@ncbr.com

At first, Dan A. Sanders and his son Dan R. Sanders knew nothing about the fuel-ethanol industry, but that didn't stop them from diving in.

As a result, Northern Colorado is now reaping the benefits of their entrepreneurial itch.

The Sanders run Front Range Energy LLC, an ethanol business in Windsor with annual revenue of $150 million. Their aim is to build it into a cutting-edge ethanol production and distribution company that will become a major supplier for a growing market — and keep father and son in business together for some years to come. The fuel-ethanol business took off amid the burst of optimism for alternative energy sources that came in the wake of soaring oil prices and rising concerns about the environmental impact of coal-powered electricity.

Like solar and wind power, the fuel-ethanol industry has run into its share of challenges. Still, it is today a mature industry producing some 14 billion gallons of ethanol annually. The production process also yields products aside from fuel, offering producers the opportunity to target markets beyond energy.

Because fuel-ethanol historically has been made from grains, and the production process doesn't greatly impact the environment, believers in sustainability are drawn to it. That was certainly the case with the Sanders. As they proclaim on their website, www.frontrangeenergy.com:

“We procure grain from local farmers and commercial resellers to manufacture fuel ethanol, distillers grains, syrup, and carbon dioxide products.... FRE is proud to produce a renewable fuel, which displaces foreign sources of energy while enhancing our national security, cleans up tailpipe emissions, creates American and Colorado jobs, and supports our local, regional, and national economies.”

The Sanders family hails from lumber-mill country north of the Columbia River in Washington state. The Sanders dabbled in cattle as well as lumber after they relocated to Gresham, an eastern exurb of Portland, Oregon.

As Dan Jr. explained, he and his dad got to thinking about getting into a new line of work.

“We wanted a business that Dad and I could do together. We kept hearing about this ethanol business. It intrigued us. It was related to cattle, because the byproducts of ethanol production go into cattle feed. We fell in love with the concept of taking a renewable crop and making all these products from it.”

Although the Sept. 11 attacks put a crimp in their financing strategy for the new venture, they were undeterred. As their planning proceeded, they began to ponder the all-important location question.

Oregon wouldn't cut it, but three states bubbled to the top: Kansas, Nebraska and Colorado. They chose Colorado, and then Weld County, based upon its proximity to a major ethanol market (Denver); the nation's corn belt; a rich transportation network; a nearby natural gas supply.

Weld County also offered plenty of space for the large-scale production facility they envisioned. In 2004, they pulled equity out of their existing businesses and formed Front Range Energy.

“We really rolled the dice,” Dan Jr. said. “It is not cheap to get into this business.” In 2006, they produced their first batch of ethanol for the commercial market. Things were chugging along as planned — and then the recession hit.

Consumers were spending less money on fuel, and cattle ranchers were pulling in their horns on feed.

The Denver market for ethanol held fairly steady, helping to stabilize Front Range as it adjusted to the twin drops in demand. But then the industry absorbed another blow. “The equity markets took a plunge,” Dan Jr. said. “You had a weak equity market and weak dollar, and suddenly more money was moving into the commodities market. When that happened, it ran the price of commodities higher. No one (in the ethanol industry) saw that coming.

“Our margins got crushed. It was a new game for us. We really had to change our risk management strategy.” Today, Front Range is back on track and growing.

“We managed our way through it,” Dan Jr. said. “People here run the operation very well and efficiently. It's a lot tighter margin situation, but it's the new reality of the industry we're in. We practice risk-management every day; you hedge your inputs and outputs.” For now, Front Range is primarily targeting the Colorado market for fuel ethanol.

Dan Jr. said there are only a couple of competitors in the state

“ We kept hearing about this ethanol business. It intrigued us. It was related to cattle, because the byproducts of ethanol production go into cattle feed. We fell in love with the concept of taking a renewable crop and making all these products from it.” ” and that the market is well defined and large enough to support the local players. But the Sanders team isn't easing up on the throttle. The industry is considered to be mature, with gargantuan players such as Chevron and Dow Chemical in the game. To compete, and to be responsive to the evolving technology so central to success in ethanol production, they are investing heavily in research and development, and exploring strategic partnerships. “Renewable fuels are going to be around forever, especially renewable biofuels,” he said. “We'll see an adaptation in the industry from grain-based to more advanced biofuels. We're working on that now. Our long-term strategy is to transition to advanced biofuels and to lead Colorado into the market.”

Do the Sanders foresee exiting the business via acquisition by one of the giants in the field? “We have no exit strategy,” Dan Jr. said. “Dad and I have a great relationship and we work well together. It never gets old. We're in this for the long haul.”

I-Cubed maps out multidimensional future

Jacob Crothe, a geographic information systems specialist and cartographer, works in i-Cubed's office in Fort Collins. i-Cubed specializes in creating, packaging and hosting geospatial data for a wide range of commercial and government clients.

by Dan Cook | news@ncbr.com

Think Intel, and you'll have an idea of how Fort Collins-based i-Cubed LLC anonymously has touched millions of people.

The company uses satellite and aerial imagery to power and enhance myriad products and services. But you'll never see the i-Cubed logo on your evening newscast or the map you download. During the High Park fires in summer 2012, i-Cubed worked with news media outlets to create aerial maps of the fires. Its technology allowed the news consumer to zero in on specific burn areas, or to watch the progress of the flames. So accurate were the images that one i-Cubed employee who was blocked from visiting property in the fire's line was able to see that his home had survived — but his barn had burned to the ground. Indeed, i-Cubed has been a major player in satellite weather coverage for news stations for years. But its products and services are used in many more markets, with hundreds of different applications. Founded in 1995, i-Cubed specializes in creating, packaging and hosting geospatial data for a wide range of commercial and government clients. Through partnerships with image-gathering sources and its own proprietary products and services, i-Cubed and its technology are in demand by the military, the utilities industry, oil and gas exploration companies, environmental management firms, the transportation sector, and on and on. Anywhere that Earth imagery, map data, and highly detailed geospatial information can be applied. “We provide parts of things that everybody does,” said marketing director Jeff Dahlke. “Our work is embedded in a lot of other people’s stuff.” While data for televised weather maps was an early application of the i-Cubed technology, the 64-employee company has come far from its roots.

Its founding inspiration came when co-founder Russell Cowart saw a need to simplify access to and utilization of satellite imagery.

Lots of footage of Planet Earth had been gathered by satellites and airplanes. But much of it was randomly stored, unenhanced — huge potential, but no one to extract that potential. That’s where i-Cubed came in. “Initially we were primarily an image-processing and services company,” Cowart said.

I-Cubed could locate the images a client requested, prepare them for use and follow up. As more service providers enter the market, i-Cubed evolved. “We developed our own enterprise-to-software offerings, primarily as software-as-a service, or SaaS, cloud-based services that we offered our clients years before these terms were even buzzwords,” he said. Along the way, i-Cubed scored major contracts with customers seeking a better solution for mapping requirements. In the late 1990s, the fledgling company landed a major contract with Space Imaging (which became GeoEye and then was acquired by Longmont-based DigitalGlobe Inc.) to create enhanced digital elevation models. The Organization of American States contracted with i-Cubed for land-use mapping and evaluation services, and the owners of cellular networks found i-Cubed’s Clutter products to be the right fit for cellular network planning. During that time, i-Cubed initiated a partnership with Spot Image (now Astrium GEO-Information Services) that has continued to the present. Meanwhile, i-Cubed was selected to participate in The Millennium Mosaic Project with DigitalGlobe, “the first seamless mosaic of the entire U.S.,” Cowart said. Geospatial contracts with Mapquest and Yahoo! followed. As demand shifted for even more complex mapping systems and solutions, i-Cubed remained on the leading edge of its industry. It had carved out an impressive niche among news organizations, at one point providing imagery and related services to about 80 percent of the industry, according to i-Cubed imagery solutions consultant Jeff Porter. It then began to move more aggressively into software to manage imagery for customers. A 2002 contract with the Army Corps of Engineers launched its now industry-standard software DataDoors; that contract continues today. In 2007, its expansive mission found strong support from strategic partner Astrium, which became an investor in the company. The Astrium partnership includes direct access to Astrium’s satellite images, giving i-Cubed a critical resource it previously lacked. Esri, a world leader in geographic information systems, also took a financial position with the company.

While i-Cubed remains a separate privately held company, the strategic investments of players like Astrium and Esri represent a solid foundation for i-Cubed’s ongoing initiatives that “ We developed our own enterprise-to-software offerings, primarily as software-as-a service, cloud-based services that we offered our clients years before these terms were even buzzwords. ”

i-Cubed LLC

push the envelope on mapping technology. So while i-Cubed remains an unsung hero to the users and lovers of richly detailed maps, nightly weather forecasts and online house-hunters, the company is well known to those in need of clear, multi-dimensional land images in a wide array of industries.

ARC Science's globes reflect dreamer's sense of wonder

by Dan Cook | news@ncbr.com

As an 11-year-old boy, Tom Ligon got hooked on space. He would gaze into the night sky and wonder about the mysteries of the universe. As the founder and chief product developer for ARC Science Simulations Inc. of Loveland, he has been able to share his passion for the solar system with millions of museum visitors throughout the world. Ligon is the dreamer, designer and programmer behind ARC's family of OmniGlobes, spherical digital displays of Earth. In Colorado, they can be seen at such locations as Denver Botanical Gardens, in the Science Department at Colorado State University and in the lobby of Foothills Community College. World travelers will find them in museums from Latin America to Europe, Asia and the Middle East. Each globe, from the largest diameter (80 inches) to the smallest (32 inches) is meticulously designed and built in ARC Science's manufacturing plant in Loveland. Ligon, a scientist by nature and by training, called it quits on his first career at Hewlett-Packard in 1981 to pursue his desire to focus his software skills on digitally interpreting the solar system.

"I just wasn't having any fun," he said. "I wanted to do something I could get excited about." In 1989, Ligon unveiled a software creation known as Dance of the Planets, which offered amateur astronomers and others curious about the solar system an opportunity to explore the planets through their computers. As Ligon delved further into the potential for software to recreate planetary features, he moved toward a product lineup targeting the museum marketplace. Initially, ARC Science concentrated on flat representations of "Earth-from-space" simulations. They were popular with museums. “It was a fairly good business,” he said. “I added layers to create more realistic views of the Earth. In the course of selling to museums, I ran into the idea that wouldn’t it be great if there was a digital globe. Around 1999, I had the inspiration of how to do that.” Spherical display development is a lengthy process. To achieve the quality Ligon was chasing, he needed a combination of top-quality commercial projectors, and display screens that were so sensitive that each one was months in the making. Moving his vision from flat to multidimensional required long days of programming and research. Finally, in 2002, ARC produced the first “self-contained spherical digital display” to hit the marketplace. The initial OmniGlobe was an 80-inch-diameter globe built for Indiana State Museum. Ligon said that the labor involved in creating display that size was so great that ARC scaled back the size of subsequent displays; the 60-inch OmniGlobe is now the largest produced. Currently, ARC Science’s primary product is the OmniGlobe family of spherical displays. It produces OmniGlobes in 32-inch, 48-inch and 60-inch diameter sizes, and the content of the globes can be customized to meet the buyer’s requirements. Most of its customers are museums and universities, about half of them domestic customers. ARC shipped its 100th OmniGlobe in 2012. ARC offers other related services for customers seeking images of Earth or other planets. For instance, it offers “astronaut views” of the Earth for designers, global data sets for space-flight simulators, and even a colorized cloud/no cloud version of Mars. The recession may have had a positive impact on ARC. Ligon said since the downturn, orders have shifted toward the smaller globes. “Last year we saw a large slant toward 32-inch system,” he said, noting that the price differential is substantial — $45,000 for the 32-inch system, $140,000 for the 60-inch. But the recession-driven sales trend may prove beneficial for ARC over time. Ligon said as the company concentrated on 32-inch systems, visual quality improved considerably. The smaller display comes with a Canon projector, which Ligon said is an excellent match for ARC’s display technology. “The difference between our product and that of our competitors is that we’re the only ones that make all of our own stuff. The visual quality of ours is quite superior because of our technology,” he said. “In this business, you have to make everything. The screens are extremely challenging. It’s a very laborious, precise project, like building a custom automobile every time. So the fact that we make everything except the projector sets us apart.” It also makes the end product an expensive one, but ARC is addressing that issue. The company recently redesigned all its products to both enhance the visual quality and make them more affordable. It added the 48-inch display, which at $85,000 is an attractive option to the smaller 32-inch and the more costly 60-inch displays, Ligon said. The Canon projectors offer the company greater flexibility in product design and quality, and Ligon said the company will continue to refine its displays going forward. At 71, Ligon looks back with satisfaction on his second career. He’s been able to share with others that sense of wonder he experienced as a boy looking at the night sky. Looking ahead, he secretly harbors a desire to update Dance of the Planets, his first solar system software success. “It’s a niche market we’re in,” he said. “We’re never going to be some huge technology company. We’re in the business of public edification, so our goals are a little different. But I must admit I get a wonderful kick out of how much people enjoy seeing our globes.

JONATHAN CASTNER

“In this business, you have to make everything. The screens are extremely challenging. It’s a very laborious, precise project, like building a custom automobile every time. So the fact that we make everything except the projector sets us apart.”

nanotechnology 2013

Great things come from small beginnings

by Clayton Moore | news@ncbr.com

A long-standing American proverb advises that “great things come from small beginnings.”

Synkera Technologies Inc., a Longmont-based research and development laboratory and manufacturing firm, is proving that maxim by using the tiniest of mechanisms to accelerate its own growth.

The company’s bread-and-butter always has been its breakthroughs in manufacturing devices through the development of nanostructures, which are themselves one output of nanotechnology—the manipulation of matter on an atomic or molecular scale. The devices that Synkera manufactures are measured in nanometers, a metric unit equal to one billionth of a meter.

Some of the products produced in its 20,000-square-foot-plant in The Campus at Longmont include ceramic membranes, which can be used for gas separation or microfiltrations; ceramic nanotemplates, which provide other firms a platform for fabricating their own nanostructures; and chemical sensors, which are providing the thrust for the company’s explosive growth.

“A big driver in our recent success has been our ability to miniaturize the size and power of these sensors to the point where they are attracting a lot of interest from companies that make mobile phones,” said Debra Deininger, strategic business manager. “Focusing on chemical sensors puts us in a place where we have precise control over these nanomaterials, create a societal benefit, and offer a viable business proposition.”

The potential applications of Sykera’s chemical sensing technology are varied. The company has the ability to detect chemical agents ranging from carbon dioxide to ozone in minuscule proportions.

That means Synkera’s sensors could make possible devices ranging from mobile app-driven breathalyzers to complete environmental monitoring of a home or office.

The research was partially funded by a study funded by the Department of Homeland Security called “Cell-All,” which focused on the concept of crowd-sourced monitoring of chemical threats using cellphones already present in a given environment.

“There are many different sensors in cell phones already, and the next step forward is chemical sensors,” said Clayton Kostecky, director of operations. “What this technology brings — whether it is in a smartphone or in small, low-cost modules mounted around your facility or your home—is the ability to understand what is around you and whether or not you are in a safe environment.”

Workers at Synkera Technologies Inc. in Longmont assemble sensors based on nanotechnology, the manipulation of matter on an atomic or molecular scale allowing the manufacture of extremely small parts.

Synkera uses a unique manufacturing process to create its sensors and membranes using anodic alumina, a self-organizing nanostructure that resembles a honeycomb. The substance is chemically inert and works well for many different nanotechnology applications. It can also be used by other firms to create their own structures.

“You can grow nanowires inside the pores of the anodic aluminum and then etch away the remaining membrane, and do whatever you want with your own nanowires,” Deininger explained.

Using nanotechnology for more than theoretical experiments puts Synkera in the enviable position of being able to offer real-world products based on cutting-edge technology.

“Commercially viable technology makes us fairly unique in the nanotechnology space. We are in a very limited subset of companies that actually commercialize products based on nanotechnology in a way that will make a difference in the life and health of real people.”

Another interesting aspect of Synkera’s process is that the self-organizing nanostructure is created within the device itself, which makes it cleaner than other free-flowing nanostructures, such as nanopowders.

“This business is clearly greener than every other process that makes your cellphone, which is a great advantage,” said Stephen Williams, the company’s president and chief technology officer.

Synkera’s recent progress has also been partially due to its expansion. Roughly three years ago, the company moved from its original 10,000-square-foot facility into a 20,000-square-foot manufacturing center.

“It’s been fantastic, and we still have room to grow,” Kostelecky said. “We moved in and immediately expanded because we were crawling on top of each other. Now we’ve outfitted this facility so the manufacturing process flows better.”

While the company’s primary focus for many years was to function as a technology incubator, co-founder Stephen Williams predicts a shift in the company’s profile.

“Going from being a developer to being a manufacturer is not an overnight process,” he said. “I think we still incubate ideas and we want to keep the pipeline full for future products. At the same time, we want to leverage the products and technology that we have developed. With these recent developments, we see this moment as an opportunity to take this relatively small business and transform it into something much larger.”

Taking a product like Synkera’s chemical sensors from a relatively small niche market and putting it on the global stage takes significant resources. The leadership of Synkera is actively looking for investors to help them reach a potential market that includes more than 6 billion mobile subscribers worldwide.

“We see a real opportunity here for scaling up from creating 100,000 devices a year to manufacturing millions of devices annually,” Kostelecky said “We will still always continue to make cool new products, but our growth will be based in manufacturing.”

Natural/organic-foods industry sees healthy future

by Heather McWilliams | news@ncbr.com

In the early 1970s, a small group of idealists purchased a five-acre plot of land south of Longmont and started a commune with an alfalfa field, a handful of goats and two beehives, selling honey out of the back of a van in Boulder Canyon to make money.

The venture planted a seed that grew into Madhava Honey Ltd., doing business as Madhava Natural Sweeteners, one of the oldest natural-food companies in Colorado. Madhava still creates a buzz today, 37 year later, in the natural and organic products industry that's blossomed along the Front Range and draws attention from across the world.

"In its infancy I was interested in offering pure, local food ... working with local honey producers with a minimal amount of handling, and that was basically it," said Craig Gerbore, founder and retired president of Madhava Natural Sweeteners. In 1976, Gerbore, a recent University of Colorado graduate, started Madhava after his friend and original commune member Bart Utley handed the business to Gerbore.

JONATHAN CASTNER

Dorys Jimenez boxes maple agave nectar on a production line at Madhava Natural Sweeteners near Longmont. The company expanded its product offerings and now places alternatives to highly processed cane sugar in nearly 20,000 retail locations across the United States. It employs more than 50 people.

“The honey business was a good business with growing demand as more awareness about food started to grow,” Gerbore said. He then began slowly cultivating sales in the area. Gerbore still serves on Madhava’s board.

The company expanded its product offerings and now places alternatives to highly processed cane sugar in nearly 20,000 retail locations across the United States. It employs more than 50 people, said Victoria Hartman, executive vice president for Madhava. The company pioneered the agave nectar industry in 2002.

“We were the first to bring it to the retail market in the United States, and even though the honey has pretty much stayed local ... the agave nectar kind of took off,” Hartman said. They still believe in providing quality, environmentally sustainable products that are fairly priced for producers, she said, including coconut sugar, which Madhava launched in November 2011.

Coconut sugar, harvested from coconut palm trees, is less processed than cane sugar and more sustainable, with up to 75 percent more sugar produced per acre than with traditional table sugar, she said. It compares with light brown sugar in taste and consistency and can be used as a one-to-one substitute for cane sugar, Hartman said.

Madhava is one of the long-time natural-product companies that sweetened the pot for the industry’s growth along the Front Range.

“I think we have a community of legacy entrepreneurs, and what’s incredibly unique about Boulder is these legacy entrepreneurs will find time for anybody with an idea,” Hartman said. Mentoring phone calls, meetings and industry know-how help build new natural and organic businesses, she said, and make Boulder a hub of the industry.

Bill Capsalis, a natural and organic industry consultant, agrees and points to nationally known players in the industry such as Celestial Seasonings, Horizon and Silk as a few examples. He’s executive director of OpenArts Boulder and a board member of Naturally Boulder, a nonprofit trade association with close to 400 members that promotes the industry. Despite the recent economic upheaval, he sees a healthy future for the industry.

“It’s really alive with innovation and alive with opportunity,” Capsalis said, “and those two things combined really give people a lot of hope.”

The Front Range houses more than 2,000 natural and organic product companies, he said, with new ones cropping up all the time. One of those companies, Boulder Soup Works, just received the Best Young Business Award from Naturally Boulder.

Boulder Soup Works started in 2009 and produces fresh, organic, gluten-free soup as a healthy alternative to canned soups, which are often high in fat, sodium and use wheat products as thickeners, said Kate Brown, Boulder Soup Works’ chief executive.

“We’ve had to reeducate our customers on what fresh soup looks like and that it doesn’t keep forever, and it’s been kind of a rocket-ship launch since then,” Brown said.

Boulder Soup Works offers seven soup flavors and distributes in seven of Whole Foods’ 11 regions as well as in conventional grocers, dishing out 150,000 servings of soup per month.

“The growing reputation of Boulder as the epicenter of the natural-products industry, that’s been very beneficial to us,”

Brown said. Boulder’s health-conscious, trend-setting consumers help educate people in other markets, Brown said, which makes retailers more willing to stock healthy foods.

Madhava continues to grow and in 2010 partnered with Greenmont Capital Partners. It plans to launch an organic honey line in the near future. Ten cents of each organic honey-line purchase will go to Madhava’s Sweet Earth Project, a foundation committed to saving bees from the devastating colony collapse of recent years.

Boulder’s healthy, environmentally conscious attitude and entrepreneurial spirit are a key ingredients to growth, Gerbore said.

“That’s pretty cool because the people who populate this area are really interested in quality food,” he said, “and that’s part of Madhava’s success: being at the right place in the right time.”

outdoors 2013

Active Front Range lifestyle lures industries, jobs

by Jeff Thomas | news@bcr.com

How ingrained the outdoor industry is in the Front Range’s economy can be surprising, even to a savvy public-relations professional in the field.

“If you went to a party in Seattle and people found out you were in the outdoor industry, everyone would ask you about it, because it wasn’t that common,” said Samantha Killgore, the U.S. marketing manager for Rab, a United Kingdom-based manufacturer of clothing for intense weather and mountaineering, and a former Seattle outdoor-industry public relations rep.

“Here it’s like everyone is connected to the outdoor industry somehow.”

A casual glance at information from the Boulder-based Outdoor Industry Association would buttress that observation, even in comparison with Seattle, known for such big-time outdoor companies as REI.

In 2006, the association found that the “active outdoor recreation economy” in Colorado contributed more than $10 billion to the state economy, including more than 107,000 jobs. The industry produced some $7.5 billion in annual retail sales and services, accounting for 4 percent of the state’s gross product and generating nearly $500 million in annual state tax revenue.

“I can’t emphasize enough the impact of the outdoor industry in bringing good-quality jobs to the Front Range,” said Avery Stonich, communications manager for the Outdoor Industry Association, which was founded here in 1989. She said the quality of the employees is enhanced by the outdoor lifestyle available here, which in turn attracts more companies to base operations here.

Rodney Smith, owner of Cunbarrel-based Backpackers Pantry, shows off his company’s line of freeze-dried foods. “Being around such a center for the natural- and organic-food industry works for us,” Smith said.

“These are talented people who are passionate about the outdoors and want to turn that passion into a career,” she said. “Many times lower-level positions are being filled by people taking the job just to get a foothold in the industry.”

It is no giant secret what brings top-line skiing companies such as Dynafit and Scarpa and upscale clothing manufacturer Spyder Active Sports Inc. to establish a presence here. But along the Front Range, the proximity to high country, transportation and business support aren't the only factors in attracting both high-quality companies and high-quality employees, as well, Stonich said.

The quantity and quality of the open lands near Front Range cities, especially in Boulder County, is attractive to outdoor athletes for everyday — sometimes lunchtime — training, she said. The better the labor pool, the better the companies it attracts.

At Rab, when CEO Matt Gower came alone from England to start up the U.S. marketing efforts he had no trouble filling out the staff, Killgore said.

“I don't think he did any advertising, not even Craigslist,” she said. “He had worked with Nepture (Mountaineering in Boulder), and knew their buyer,” who was an initial hire).

“Another customer-service person (hired) was a buyer from Spyder. I came along, as I was doing PR in the industry, and another customer-service person came from the Access Fund,” Killgore said. “Everyone here has had a lot of experience in the industry, and we haven't had to cast a very wide net.”

Apparently, switching brands is not uncommon in the outdoor industry, especially here where talented people who took jobs for the experience are looking to quickly move up.

When it comes to the big brands, Killgore said, there seems to be an imperative to at least have a satellite office in Colorado. In her former field of outdoor PR, she said, a Pearl Street address in Boulder is somewhat akin to a national lobbyist having a K Street address in Washington, D.C.

But it isn't all about big brands coming in to show off their wares, which are manufactured offshore. Some of the more impressive small- to mid-size businesses actually make skis and snowboards here, and while they don't have the impact that Head Ski once had in terms of employment, they have a big impact on moving the industry ahead in technology.

For instance, Donek, located east of Denver, has been making snowboards for 22 years and pioneered the use of computer numerical control in production. Drake Powderworks of Boulder and Ellison of Westminster also are moving ahead with progressive shapes and designs.

The Front Range also is home to a number of advocacy groups, Stonich said, including the Bikes Belong Coalition, the International Mountain Bicycling Association, Leave No Trace and the Access Fund, as well as outdoor publications including Skiing, Women's Adventure, Climbing, Backpacker, Freeskier, Skiing Business, Transworld Business and SNEWS, the outdoor-industry trade publication.

“I can't emphasize enough the impact of the outdoor industry in bringing good-quality jobs to the Front Range.”

communications manager,
Outdoor Industry Association

The outdoor industry has begun to cast a wider net as well, attracting companies that make more peripheral equipment to those extending outdoor sports into fashion, such as Boulder's Skirt Sports, which can bring a feminine side to a triathlon.

But perhaps no company has a more unique place in the outdoor industry than Backpacker's Pantry of Gunbarrel, located almost a stone's throw from the former home of Head Ski, which dominated the local outdoor industry in the '70s and early '80s. The manufacture of quality freeze-dried backpacking goods has found a unique place here, situated between outdoor products and the natural-foods industry.

“It was really coming home for us,” said owner Rodney Smith, who moved the family business here from Redding, California, in 1992. Much of his family moved from Colorado to California during the Dust Bowl — don't feel too bad; they were related to Donald Wills Douglas of McDonnell Douglas Aircraft — but the homecoming was both a business and quality-of-life decision.

“In California, our workers comp (insurance) was going through the roof,” Smith said. “We started looking around and in the end we just wanted our family here.”

Backpacker's Pantry is very much a family business, but also one that has resisted easy solutions, such as moving its manufacturing overseas. Today, the company employs about 45 people, and produces a product that is sought after by serious backcountry enthusiasts while still maintaining a price that is very competitive with even cut-rate retailers such as Walmart.

In that fashion, Backpacker's Pantry may represent what actually fuels the outdoor industry.

“We're a food company, and obviously being around such a center for the natural- and organic-food industry works for us,” Smith said, “but that Boulder name has really helped (us) get into REI stores across the nation.”

Even without outsourcing, he said, “we still eke out a pretty good living. It's a matter of how you run your business. I can't control quality if I manufacture in China.

“I think people who have the opportunity to run their business here think a lot about that.”

Retooling for profit in the robotic welding world

by Dan Cook | news@bcbr.com

That Harley-Davidson motorcycle that passed you on the freeway today? Wolf Robotics LLC helped build it.

The John Deere tractor at work on a nearby farm? Wolf again.

And what about the Caterpillar backhoe digging trenches for that downtown construction project? Yes, Wolf's there, too.

Wolf Robotics' unseen hands are on many of America's large-scale welding fabrication projects, and in the process it's helping to rebuild the nation's manufacturing industry, one weld at a time.

"We're focused on large fabrications, and we've got some strengths in that area," said Doug Rhoda, chief executive of Wolf Robotics. "We feel our mission is noble. We're automating things that have never been done before. You read about reshoring in American manufacturing, and we've got a small part of enabling that."

Wolf builds fully integrated robotic welding systems for the construction, agricultural, mining and transportation and fabrication industries. Located in an 110,000-square-foot facility in Fort Collins, Wolf has installed more than 8,400 robotic systems throughout North America.

One of Wolf's strengths is in retooling older robotics systems. In 2006, Caterpillar Aurora management realized the robotic welders it purchased in 1980 were outdated. Replacement parts were not available, but the positioners supporting the weight of the materials being welded were still usable.

Wolf stepped in with a robot, robot carrier, controller and motor/gearbox, integrating them with the existing positioners, saving Caterpillar Aurora hundreds of thousands of dollars.

Because Wolf provides expensive capital equipment to other companies, the recession took a big bite out of its profits. In order to stay in the black and avoid layoffs, everyone at the company took a reduction in pay while top management looked for ways to diversify.

"We were still profitable through the recession, but we all took some austerity measures you might say," Rhoda said. "We took the medicine, and we've come out of it well. I'd say we're thriving right now." Wolf is thriving because the company sought defense contracts, providing equipment to fabricate parts for large land-based armored vehicles transporting soldiers in Afghanistan.

"These contracts really helped us bridge the recession," Rhoda said.

Another profitable government partnership came the company's way thanks in part to its partnership with the Colorado Association for Manufacturing and Technology, or CAMT.

A CAMT workshop helped Wolf develop new products focusing on innovation, and connected the company with NASA technologies. That partnership is expected to help Wolf turn federal research-and-development and technology into products that will improve American manufacturing productivity.

Also, CAMT's ExporTech program helped Wolf find a number of international clients by providing overseas networking opportunities. Those opportunities were expected to boost international sales for the company from 1 percent in 2010 to 4 percent or 5 percent in 2012. This year Wolf is looking forward to overall revenue growth of around 20 percent.

Wolf has been manufacturing robotic automation cells since 1978, originally as an arm of ABB, a giant Swedish electrical company. In 2003, Wolf broke away from ABB and has grown from 20 employees to 115. With increased demand for its expertise, more hiring is expected. The company will be looking for the kind of person who once would have been holding a blowtorch to make the robots that now do hazardous welding work.

Wolf has been able to find those people so far. "I'm really proud of our team," Rhoda said.

"The welding industry ... can be a dirty, undesirable environment," Wolf Robotics spokesman Chuck Boyer said. "With a number of older, skilled welders retiring, fewer people are taking their place. Robots can produce 20 times what a human welder can. But we want people with the attention to detail and care who would have been on the lines to help us put together and program the equipment."

Some of the equipment those programmers will work on include Wolf's robotics that both weld and grind when finish work is required. Previously, a part that was welded and needed the weld bead to be finished smooth or the weld spatter removed required a human to do the clean-up work or relocation of the part for further processing. Now, the robot performs the weld, then changes heads and completes the finishing work.

Such innovations have helped Wolf gain a firm footing in the robotic welding industry, with a future as bright as a welding arc.

"There's a real need for large-scale fabrications. When things go overseas and are shipped across the ocean, if there's a design change and it's halfway home ... 'well, too bad,' manufacturers used to say," Rhoda said. "Now we're able to help meet that need

Adam Truog works on an inverted rotation boom at Wolf Robotics LLC's plant in Fort Collins. Wolf Robotics' unseen hands are on many of America's large-scale welding fabrication projects, and in the process it's helping to rebuild the nation's manufacturing industry, one weld at a time.

Technological advances make production

affordable, accessible, more competitive

by Valerie Cleaton | news@bcbr.com

With the advent of digital cameras, smartphones and YouTube, anyone can shoot, edit and distribute his or her own videos. But far from making professional video production obsolete, advances in technology are helping to take the video production industry in the Rocky Mountain region to the next level.

For Dan Wierling, co-owner of DGW Video Productions LLC, the Internet has become the primary destination for much of what

Dave Ridgway, owner of Blue Mesa Media in Boulder, works at his editing bay. "When I first started," he said, "everything was copied onto VHS tapes and later onto DVDs. Now with the Internet, we can deliver our product literally worldwide in minutes."

he produces. Founded in 1995, the Cheyenne, Wyoming, video-production company offers more than 40 video and audio services for everything from event videography to small-business commercials to music videos.

Lately, Wierling said, much of his business has focused on creating promotional website videos for clients such as the Cheyenne Stampede Junior A Hockey League team and the Cheyenne Capidolls roller derby team. The company will soon begin working with the Capidolls to create a series of training videos for new team members that explain the rules of the sport, equipment and other details.

“You can tell someone why they should join your club, but it’s a lot different seeing it in action in a video on your website,” Wierling said.

Dave Ridgway, owner of Blue Mesa Media in Boulder, is even more emphatic about the importance of the web as a home for video.

“The days of physical media are pretty much over,” Ridgway said. “When I first started, everything was copied onto VHS tapes and later onto DVDs. Now with the Internet, we can deliver our product literally worldwide in minutes.”

Ridgway founded Blue Mesa in St. Louis in 1998 and moved the business to Boulder in 2003. From the start, he specialized in creating corporate training videos, especially for the food industry. Recent clients include Old Chicago and Gordon Biersch.

“When you’re working with a ‘made-from-scratch’ restaurant like Old Chicago with more than 100 locations, you need to make sure that everyone is making the food the same way, so that customers have the same experience no matter where they are in the country,” Ridgway said.

In addition to corporate training videos, Blue Mesa has created TV commercials for local, regional and national companies such as Land Rover, Audi, Porsche, Nissan and Mercedes Benz, as well as doing pro bono work for local organizations such as HospiceCare of Boulder and Broomfield Counties and the Emergency Family Assistance Association.

Like advances on the web, video equipment technology is improving at lightning speed as well — which some in the industry view as a double-edged sword.

“The cost to do video has plummeted,” said Paul Anderson, owner of Paul L. Anderson Productions, Inc., in Fort Collins. Anderson specializes in corporate videos, particularly for clients in the technical or medical fields, such as Waterpik. He also works with area nonprofits, most recently including Disabled Resource Services.

“With equipment so much more affordable, there’s always somebody who will agree to do a job for cheaper,” Anderson continued. “It can be a tough business.”

“It seems that ‘video’ production in the traditional sense is a race to the bottom now,” said Paul Lee, producer at 42 Media Productions LLC, a video company in Boulder that specializes in creating original content for ventures including feature films, commercial campaigns and television pilots. “Available computers, software and cameras have made it so affordable that anybody can make ‘videos’ and charge pennies for low-quality work.”

“There is a perception that anyone with a $300 camera and an edit package can produce great videos,” Wierling agreed. “But that’s not going to come close to the quality that a professional video-production company can offer.”

Many local video-production companies have found that the best way to ensure their edge over amateur videographers is by capitalizing on the drop in equipment prices themselves and updating their own technologies.

“During the ‘08 to ‘09 era, it was like someone turned the spigot off,” said Ridgway, referring to the drastic downswing in business during the recession. “Now companies are putting money back into their marketing and education.” That bounce back in revenue has allowed both Blue Mesa and DGW to invest around $30,000 each in the last year to upgrade their editing systems.

“We have to make investments in equipment and software to stay on the bleeding edge and achieve the high-end, polished look our clients expect,” Ridgway said.

42 Productions also made a major investment in technology when it became the first company in Colorado to acquire the Red One 4K and then the Red Epic 5K digital cinema cameras.

“These are the same cameras shooting some of Hollywood’s biggest films right now,” Lee said. “With Red leading the way, the bounds of electronic imaging are being stretched every day, and you can really see the results.”

In the end, it is this investment in superior technology coupled with years of experience and expertise that determines whether a video production company succeeds in an increasingly competitive environment.

“My clients aren’t looking for the cheapest person out there,” Anderson said. “They keep coming back to me because of the high-quality product I provide.”

ROCKY MOUNTAIN TECH BUSINESS CATEGORIES

Aerospace: Companies that conduct research and development, engineering and/or manufacturing related to aircraft, missiles, space vehicles or auxiliary equipment or parts. Includes military and nonmilitary prime contractors and other contractors devoting a significant portion of their business to aerospace.

Agribusiness: Companies that make products or are involved in technologies related to farming, ranching or agriculture.

Apparel: Companies that manufacture clothing or accessories – such as neckties, belts or purses – for men, women and children as well as for specific manufacturing uses such as clean-room garments. Includes contract cutting and sewing companies and embroidery businesses. Manufacturers of apparel specifically made for sports are listed in the Sports section.

Associations: Colorado-based establishments that promote the professional interests of companies with services primarily related to manufacturing and technology. These organizations may conduct research, develop statistics, sponsor quality and certification standards, lobby public officials, or publish newsletters, books or periodicals.

Automotive/Transportation: Companies that manufacture products or are involved in technologies related to vehicles and transportation including passenger cars, trucks, locomotives, buses, motorcycles, commercial ships, pleasure boats or recreational vehicles. Includes aftermarket items such as motor vehicle parts, accessories, tools, equipment, materials and supplies.

Bioscience: Companies with products or services that have their origins in any field related to the life sciences such as environmental, biology, botany, chemistry, food, fisheries, forests, health, medicine, oceanography, pharmacy, veterinary and other allied industries.

Clean Tech: Companies with products or services in the field of renewable energy. This includes recycling, wind power, solar power, hydropower, lighting, biofuels, green transportation, electric motors and green chemistry.

Computers and Peripherals: Companies that manufacture or service computer-related products including PCs, laptops, personal digital assistants (PDAs), mainframes, modems, monitors and printers. Includes computer product research and development and companies making computer accessories – like joysticks or speakers. Includes computer training in repair, programming, software packages, business systems, computer operations and network management. Related services include disaster recovery services, software installation services and security management.

Data Services: Companies that provide value-added data including market and competitive intelligence, marketing lists and sales leads.

Data Storage: Companies that are involved in research and development, engineering, manufacturing, software, repair and/or services related to magnetic, optical and holographic recording devices – disk drives and arrays, tape drives and arrays and automated libraries. Includes companies that do the same with storage media – magnetic tape and/or cassettes, optical and holographic disks and hard drive media.

Electronics: Companies involved in the production, fabrication, design or assembly of electronic components, subassemblies or finished products. Includes circuit board manufacturers and designers.

Energy: Companies involved in the production and development of energy or energy products. Includes oil, coal and gas mineral development, maintenance of energy procurement and delivery programs, greenhouse gas inventories and energy efficiency consulting, mineral property appraisal, solvents and systems for removal of CO₂ and contaminants from the atmosphere, sensors used in meters that transmit data over an electric company's power grid.

Engineering: Civil, environmental, electrical, mechanical, software and structural engineers that provide program management, engineering, research and development, testing, consulting and construction services to companies.

Environmental Consulting: Companies involved in environmental assessments, site characterization, petroleum remediation, spill prevention and containment, Brownfield cleanup and redevelopment, mine reclamation and remediation, air quality, waste management, pollution prevention, radioactive waste and packaging and management of hazardous materials in the soil, air or water.

Federal Labs: Federally funded research labs in Colorado in a range of fields, including renewable energy, climate and weather analysis, space physics, telecommunications, agriculture and earth science.

Food and Beverage Producers: Food or products manufacturers including beverages (soft drinks, juices, mineral water, beer, mead and wine), baked goods, candy, cheese, meat, condiments and other items.

Geographic information science: Companies that use Geographical Information Science (GIS) to analyze, manage and present geographical data. Includes companies that provide commercial, residential, public works design, ALTA surveys, design surveys, subdivision plats, development plan design, construction surveying and topographic mapping.

Home/Building: Companies that manufacture products related to home furnishings, small appliances, home consumer goods and home-building products such as cabinets, windows or paneling.

Instruments: Companies that manufacture specific-purpose instrumentation or controls. Includes instruments for measuring and testing electricity and electrical signals; instruments for measuring, displaying, indicating, recording, transmitting and controlling industrial processes; and instruments for search, detection, navigation, guidance, aeronautical and nautical systems.

Internet: Companies with services specifically related to the Internet. Includes e-commerce companies selling products online; Internet service providers and Web hosting companies; companies offering e-mail list management and/or tracking systems; and companies that develop and sell hardware or software primarily related to Internet functions. Internet publishing is listed under Publishing; Web development is listed under Web Development

Internet Marketing – Companies that specialize in the provision of marketing-based strategies, efforts and endeavors within a virtual, online-based commercial marketplace.

Internet Service Providers: Companies that provide access to the Internet using wire, wireless or fiber-optic connections. Provider may also lease server space to companies or individuals.

IT Consultants: Companies that advise businesses on how to use information technology (IT) to meet business objectives. Consultants may also manage and administer IT systems on a company's behalf.

Machine Shops: Companies engaged in machining metal parts on a job or order basis using machine tools, such as lathes, automatic screw machines, and machines for boring, grinding and milling.

Materials: Companies that manufacture chemicals or any other materials used in advanced technological production processes or products. Companies included may be primary source producers or suppliers, fabricators, designers or assemblers.

Medical Products: Companies involved in the manufacture or research and development of medical-related products. Includes laboratory apparatus and furniture, surgical and medical instruments, surgical appliances and supplies, dental equipment and supplies. Also includes electromedical and electrotherapeutic apparatus such as magnetic resonance imaging equipment, ultrasound equipment, pacemakers, hearing aids, electrocardiographs, etc.

Manufacturing: Companies that use machines, tools and labor to produce finished goods from raw materials. This may apply to large-scale industrial production in high-tech industries or handcrafted materials.

Miscellaneous: Manufacturers and technology providers that could not be categorized into any of the directory's other categories.

Mobile-App Developers: Companies that develop application software for handheld devices such as mobile phones and PDAs.

Nanotechnology: Companies with a primary focus on research, development and manufacture of devices, materials, electronics, machines, medicines, etc. on the scale of atoms and molecules.

Natural Products: Companies that produce organic or natural health foods and products. Includes suppliers and manufacturers of foods and beverages, herbal extracts, dietary supplements, yoga and Pilates products, sports and outdoor equipment, clothing, skin-care products, cleaning products and art supplies.

Personal-Care Products: Companies that manufacture personal-care products including cosmetics, fragrances, feminine hygiene, hair care, oral hygiene and skin care. Also includes makers of vitamins and nutritional supplements.

Pet Products: Companies that manufacture pet food, treats, toys, clothes, shelters, grooming and health products and accessories.

Photonics: Companies with a primary focus on the research, development and manufacture of products and services dealing with the generation, manipulation and detection of light. Includes traditional optics – cameras, glasses, light bulbs and telescopes – and optoelectronics used for medical devices, computers, telecommunications, biotechnology, military, remote sensing, transportation and space exploration.

Plastics: Companies involved in the manufacture or research and development of plastic parts or products including injection molding, laminating, resins, coatings and foams.

Printing, Graphics and Publishing: Companies that provide pre- and post-press printing and graphics services including graphic design, output of computer files to film or plates, black-and-white and color printing, die cutting, folding and binding. Category also contains print, electronic and or audio publishing companies, including newspapers, magazines, books, catalogs, greeting cards and advertising coupons.

Remote Sensing: Companies engaged in or producing products for gathering, interpreting and mapping geophysical data. Includes companies that locate and measure subsurface resources, such as oil, gas and minerals. Surveying techniques may include magnetic surveys, gravity surveys, seismic surveys, or electrical and electromagnetic surveys.

Research and Development: Companies and laboratories engaged primarily in either basic or applied research in the physical or social sciences. Physical sciences include electronics, computers, chemistry, geology, mathematics, oceanography, physics and other allied subjects. Social sciences include cognitive development, sociology, psychology, language, behavior, economics and others.

Robotics: Companies engaged in the research and development or manufacture of automated mechanical systems.

Search Optimization - Companies that help clients increase the volume and quality of traffic to their website from search engines and social media.

Software/Integrated Systems: Companies that produce, design or perform services concerning any aspect of software (writing, modifying, testing or supporting) for PCs, mainframes, PDAs or embedded systems. Includes custom computer programming services, software publishers and companies that mass reproduce computer software on disks, tapes, cartridges or CD-ROMs.

Sports/recreation: Companies that manufacture sporting goods and apparel, including parts specifically designed for the sporting goods industry.

Tech Education - Companies and schools that provide training and certification for technology-related skills primarily in electronics and computers.

Telecommunications: Companies that perform telecommunications research and development or that manufacture telecommunications transmission equipment, test equipment, components or software. Includes wired and wireless carriers of voice, data, text, sound and video transmissions, including telephone, paging, radio, broadcast, cable and satellite TV, but not Internet service providers (included under Internet). Includes telecommunications equipment and wiring installers, telecommunications management consultants and telecommunications services resellers.

Testing: Companies and laboratories engaged in performing physical, chemical and other analytical testing services, such as acoustics or vibration testing, assaying, biological testing, calibration testing, electrical and electronic testing, geotechnical testing, mechanical testing, nondestructive testing or thermal testing.

Video/film/Audio: Companies that provide video and audio editing and production services for corporate and private events, including training videos, television commercials, product roll-outs, documentaries, award banquets, holiday parties and weddings. May provide full-production services such as scripting, storyboarding and multimedia presentations.

Web Development: Web design and development including graphics, software, content, databases, e-commerce, web applications and web marketing. Does not include Internet service providers or hosting companies, which are listed under Internet Service Providers.

Wholesale: Companies manufacturing and/or selling goods at the wholesale level. Includes both wholesale merchants who sell goods on their own account and brokers who arrange sales for others for a commission or fee.
