Celebrating 90 years of serving Boulder and Broomfield Counties.

OPEN LETTER AN OPEN LETTER TO THE BOULDER COUNTY BUSINESS COMMUNITY FROM JEAN LUND AND JOSIE HEATH

Protect Yourself from the Political Winds: Sustainable Investments for the Long Term

By the time you read this, we will know who won the presidential election. But, for the purposes of this Open Letter to the Business Community, it doesn't matter who won.

True, we must be agile enough to adjust to periodic adjustments in political winds, as well as changes in the social and economic climate, and the impacts they have on our business operations or community needs. However, we also know the climate will soon change again. That is why, more important than dealing with the present circumstances, the real secret to success lies in our long term strategic investments, including philanthropy, that keep us strong no matter which way the wind is blowing.

A case in point was our community's response to the tragic Fourmile Canyon fires in 2010. The victims of that disaster suffered the terrible destruction of personal property along with the less tangible, but often more painful, loss of irreplaceable family history and the connection to fond memories. Our economy also took a short-term hit as businesses dealt with everything from the absence of critical employees to the disruption of normal government services.

Fortunately, Boulder County had the resources in place to ease our recovery from the Fourmile Canyon fire. Everything was available from emergency relocation services to grief counseling due to prior funding commitments, helping to speed the healing from an awful community tragedy.

The Community Foundation was proud to play its own part as a resource for effectively and efficiently distributing financial contributions to fire victims. Again, consistent annual contributions that keep our organization strong, not one time emergency funding, was the foundation for the Community Foundation's critical role in our response to the Fourmile Canyon fire.

The lesson here is age-old, but worth remembering, the investments we make today are the seeds of our future success. Our effective response to the Fourmile Canyon fire would not have been possible without sustained attention to community needs.

It is in this vein that we should all be disturbed by reports that charitable giving as a percent of income in Boulder County has dipped below the rate for all of Colorado. We also lag behind the giving rates in the higher income levels amongst our peer cities, such as Ann Arbor, Austin and Eugene.

Make no mistake, we are a resourceful community, as demonstrated by the wealth of strong non-profit and government safety net programs our taxes and contribution dollars support. However, these programs will only remain strong and available to us if they have your support.

So, as you flip through this year's Giving Guide, please reflect on the how the good works of our Boulder County non-profit agencies have benefited you, your employees, and your business. Then consider what contribution you can make, today and in the future.

Your sustained charitable investments are the best protection we have against the inevitable winds of change, be they social, economic, or even political.

Make the simplest wishes come true.

Diagnose a fatal brain and spinal cord tumor—the last thing that I wanted to do. What I got to the point that I had to choose between eating and not eating, I thank the staff at KITA for help.

I continued to look for work and KITA gave me the foundation that I needed, making my basic survival needs affordable and do-able.

With your support financially, I recovered forward, working hard, enjoying life and am still very grateful for the assistance that KITA and the community gave to me.

Last year, KITA's Boulder County households needed they would run out of food before they got ready to buy more.

KITA provided you, our pounds of food, a hot meal, to alleviate hunger and help families, equate you people with dignity and help us to help to work with other valued people.

SPONSOR LETTER CORDEN PHARMA

Corden Pharma Colorado, formerly Roche Colorado Corporation, is proud to return as title sponsor for the annual Giving Guide.

Corden Pharma produces medicines that save and enhance lives by tackling some of the world's most challenging health conditions, such as AIDS. Our research and manufacturing activities also make valuable contributions to the local economy and tax base. All of these are metrics of success for our pharmaceutical business.

We also know Corden Pharma would not enjoy such great business success without the support we receive from our local non-profit community. Whether it is through the direct assistance they provide our employees or the cultural assets they champion, our company benefits from the high quality business environment that Boulder County non-profits help sustain.

So, while our name has changed, Corden Pharma has maintained the same tradition of support for our local non-profit institutions that our founders first instilled back in 1946. This includes both the voluntary employee time as well as direct financial support that we offer, as do so many of our other generous Boulder County business colleagues.

Through the Giving Guide, though, Corden Pharma has the unique opportunity to highlight all the great work of Boulder County's non-profits. The breadth and depth of the services they provide is impressive and worthy of all our support.

SPONSOR LETTER Foothills UNITED WAY

To give: to provide, contribute, furnish, deliver. Each of these meanings associated with the word give bring a slightly different perspective to the act of sharing one's time, talents and treasure. In the same way, this 2013 edition of the Giving Guide offers information that can help you make decisions about how you can making a difference in our communities in ways that are most appropriate and meaningful for you.

Foothills United Way is grateful to the Boulder County Business Report for producing this tool and proud to have been a partner since the inception of the publication. The Guide is not a listing of the needs in our communities, nor a recitation of conditions that need to be addressed. It is a forward-looking document that provides a pathway to creating positive, sustainable change. When we reach out a hand to one, we influence the conditions for all.

For 90 years Foothills United Way has worked to mobilize people and resources so that each person in our communities has the opportunity to thrive. There are quality agencies and programs available here to help. But the services they provide cannot happen without your support. This Guide is just that, a guide to making your decision about how you can make a difference – how you can LIVE UNITED.

Nonprofit sector itself is in need

It's difficult to overstate the importance of the nonprofit sector. Nonprofits influence our economy — and our society — in incalculable ways, providing much-needed services where government and business fall short.

During the devastating forest fires that flared along the Front Range in 2012 to personal disasters brought on by economic declines, nonprofits provide a helping hand to those in need.

But nonprofits also are in need. Demand for nonprofit services has increased, even as donations have declined in many areas due to economic uncertainties. For nonprofits to continue doing good, it is incumbent on businesses and individuals to step forward to assist those nonprofits through donations or volunteering.

And we have some amazing nonprofits in the Boulder Valley. From large organizations such as Foothills United Way — celebrating its 90th anniversary — and The Community Foundation Serving Boulder County to smaller nonprofits such as Boulder County CareConnect or the Safehouse Progressive Alliance for Nonviolence, our region is blessed with a diverse and caring nonprofit sector.

This Giving Guide, published by the Boulder County Business Report, seeks to identify the key players in that sector, servicing as a bridge between nonprofits and the individuals who need their services, as well as the businesses that can contribute time and money.

We're grateful to the sponsors and advertisers who made this publication possible, and to our chief researcher, Mariah Gant, for her hard work compiling this data. If your nonprofit listing is incorrect, or if your organization is not listed, please email Mariah at mgant@bcbr.com.

Most of all, please use this publication as a resource when considering where you or your business can contribute time, money, goods or services.

And let's show the Boulder Valley's nonprofit sector that we can help them, so they can help others.

Ben's family moved a lot. His mother used rent money to buy drugs and alcohol and they would often get evicted. Ben's grades and sense of stability suffered. His mother was incarcerated and he became homeless.

Living at Attention Homes, Ben found stability. He was able to concentrate on school, foster his love of music and acquire much needed mentoring. After a few months, his grades improved dramatically and college became a realistic goal. Circle of Care

PETER WAYNE

Matchmaker turn isolation into inclusion, reconnecting elders with their community

by Elizabeth Gold | news@bcbr.com

BOULDER — Coloradans have to work hard to become bored with nothing to do.

From outdoor recreation to cultural art programs, the choices available stretch farther than the day is long. For many, however, unyielding barriers stand in the way of enjoying and participating in things in which the rest of us take pleasure.

Homebound elders and senior-facility residents who don't have transportation, for example, tend to be limited in how and where they spend their days. If they have physical, cognitive or financial challenges on top of that, the chances for being active and involved in the community are reduced even more.

The results can be isolation, depression and withdrawal.

It's easy to forget that these people have contributed and helped create the local environment in which we delight. They've raised children here, taught in our schools and set the tone for the foundation that sets Colorado apart from the rest of the world. When our elders are out of circulation, we lose their voices, experiences and gifts.

Joan Raderman, who sees herself as a matchmaker, saw the win-win potential of reconnecting elders to the community and responded to it by bringing Circle of Care to life in 2004. Since then, the nonprofit organization has rekindled passion for life in elders, provided access to classes and events for volunteers and blended the knowledge of multiple generations into a new kind of community.

Circle of Care keeps the question "who's helping whom?" in motion.

Without involvement, people generally retreat into isolation.

"What causes elders to isolate includes not having the money to do anything extra, no transportation to get there if they did, physical or cognitive decline and not having a buddy to do things with," Raderman said.

She referred to CU-Boulder's Senior Auditor Program, which allows Colorado residents age 55 and older to sit in on most classes for free, as an opportunity that comes with hidden barriers for some.

The challenge of registering for a class online, getting transportation to the university and negotiating a walk to the classroom with a cane or a walker can turn the opportunity into a pipe dream.

If that person has a companion/partner who helps reduce the difficulties, however, the opportunity turns into a stimulating activity.

Raderman described the Circle of Care protocol as incentivized civic engagement. She has worked with CU, for example, to allow elders who have physical and technical challenges to participate in the auditor program with a companion/partner. One appeal to the volunteer is the opportunity to audit the classes with the elder.

Other events aimed at ending isolation and community involvement include free tickets to films and cultural programs such as the Colorado Music Festival, Boulder Philharmonic Orchestra and Colorado Shakespeare Festival.

Volunteer/companions receive the same free ride as their elder partners in these outings as well.

“Soon it becomes personal to volunteers, and there’s a shift that goes beyond the tickets,” Raderman said. “Volunteers become family.”

Some volunteers see the opportunity to attend events outside of their own budgets as an additional benefit.

“There’s one woman, a single mother in school, who wants to give her kids experiences she can’t afford,” Raderman said. “The kids are taught how to help elders when they attend, in addition to having access to resources they wouldn’t have had the opportunity to.”

Raderman partners with more than 50 arts and cultural organizations to be able to offer free entry to more than 200 events yearly. She’s also looking to work with organizations such as Head Start, which provides

Partnership's safety net for at-risk youths aimed at heading off future problems

by Heather McWilliams | news@bcbr.com

Counties in Colorado provide a matrix of services to help at-risk youths and prevent a raft of future problems.

Boulder County interlaces such services among an 11-agency collaboration catching at-risk youths in a web of care that leads to better outcomes and safer communities. After 14 years of dedicated, results-driven work, Boulder County IMPACT was named the 2012 Colorado Collaboration Award winner by the Colorado Nonprofit Association.

"They've been very effective in combining efforts of government agencies and also nonprofits to effectively serve youth at risk so they do not become part of the justice system as adults," said Renny Fagan, president and chief executive of the Colorado Nonprofit Association. The association supports Colorado nonprofits through education, training and advocacy in the Legislature.

Boulder County IMPACT, or Integrated Managed Partnership for Adolescents and Child Community Treatment, serves juveniles at risk of being removed from the home because of criminal behavior, mental-health problems or other home welfare issues, said Susan Caskey, executive director of the organization.

IMPACT blends staff resources, funding and services among its partner agencies in a rich, sharing model, Caskey said. The organization served 850 youngsters last year with 70 percent of the youths entering IMPACT through the juvenile justice system.

“We spend eight hours a week as a collaborative, talking about specific kids and families and coming together to bring all the agencies’ expertise and provide options,” Caskey said. The team identifies underlying causes of criminal behavior and then prioritizes the right intervention. For example, a student entering the system for drug use might face underlying issues at home, such as a lack of food, safety or other basic needs — issues that must be addressed for treatment to be effective.

“For any of us, it would be very hard to focus on therapy if we weren’t eating,” Caskey said.

It’s a consistent, cohesive, priority-driven approach to intervention that creates less confusion for youths and families and doesn’t feel as overwhelming, she said. Rather than being inundated with expectations from separate agencies, participants get a consistent message across the board. It’s a system that works, too, with Boulder County committing youths to out-of-home placements at a lower rate than the rest of the state.

From 2004 to 2011, data collected by IMPACT and the state of Colorado showed commitment rates in Boulder County fell to nearly one-third the Colorado rate, said Caskey. IMPACT collaboration doesn’t just save children from deten-

Association for Community Living gives hope to people society forgot

by Clayton Moore | news@bcbr.com

When Ailsa Wonnacott, executive director of the Association for Community Living, recently made her annual appeal for funding to the Boulder County Commissioners, she brought along a powerful message.

In her office in rural Longmont, Wonnacott keeps the cardboard sign she brought to that meeting. On one side, her team created colorful images of all the work ACL does to advocate on behalf of children and adults who live with developmental disabilities, ranging from training young parents to fostering changes in public policy.

On the other side was a coarse image of a tiny, rundown building behind a chain-link fence. Earlier this year, the association discovered 10 people with disabilities living in the studio-size outbuilding, another living in a shed outside, and a couple in a makeshift tent.

"This is not a refugee camp," Wonnacott said. "That is downtown Longmont last Thursday afternoon. For some people, the only safety net is us, and that's only if we can find them."

At its heart, the association is dedicated to ensuring that all members of the communities in Boulder and Broomfield counties are able to live, work and participate fully in all aspects of community life. It began as a grassroots movement supported by Boulder parents in the early 1960s that grew into the local chapter of the community-based organization The Arc. This year, the association celebrates its 50th anniversary.

“This movement has grown from a few parents meeting in a living room to being an organization that helps change the world,” Wonnacott said. “But of course, as we change the world, the world changes in all kinds of ways that we can’t predict.”

In fact, those changes represent serious obstacles to the people her organization serves. While access to public education has improved over the decades, other challenges have exploded in the past five years.

Among these hurdles are a crisis in funding for adult services, a tsunami of aging caregivers for children with disabilities, increased rates of autism spectrum conditions, protracted wait times to access services, and potentially devastating cuts in funding for elementary and secondary education.

“Cuts in education impact students without disabilities significantly, but they impact students with disabilities catastrophically,” Wonnacott said. “If there are fewer adults in a school, students will not have the support they need to attend general education classes, let alone benefit from individualized help.”

The agency, a 501(c)3 nonprofit, partners extensively with school districts in Boulder and Broomfield counties and with other service providers such as the Boulder-based Community Centered Board, better known as Imagine! With just eight staff members and some 200 volunteers, the association provided advocacy, referrals and training to more than 1,200 people with disabilities and their families in 2011.

The community is vital to the agency’s financial success. With a budget around $650,000, fully half of the association’s budget comes from the funds provided through Arc Thrift Stores throughout the state.

“The Arc Thrift Stores are absolutely key to our survival. We always tell people to please buy there, and donate there,” Wonnacott said.

One of the association’s clients was

The community can help support the association’s work in other ways as well. The nonprofit offers membership ranging from $2 for people with disabilities to $500 for a lifetime membership, and welcomes individual donations. The organization also values its many volunteers. Behind every charitable gift there's a story...

and who doesn't love a good story?

Longmont Legacy

We joined Longmont Legacy to support and give back to the community that has given so much to us--a great place to raise our children, wonderful friends and patients.

We chose Longmont Legacy because it focuses on the youth of the St. Vrain community--from newborns to teens. Providing funds for programs to these kids can only improve our community in future years.

Longmont Legacy has and continues to be an incredible experience to share with Zack and Lindsay. They enjoy giving back and affecting the lives of kids their age in a positive way.

tion, she said; it also saves money. Boulder County accounts for about $1.3 million in annual expenses for committed young people compared with the estimated $4.3 million it would cost Colorado if the county mirrored statewide patterns.

IMPACT's collaborative model has received national recognition, too, Caskey said, and inspired Colorado state legislation. House Bill 1451 provides incentives to counties creating similar collaborations, she said.

The Colorado Collaboration Award, in its second year, comes with $50,000, Fagan said. IMPACT plans to use the money to improve results through research-based intervention and constant vigilance when weeding out what doesn't work and nurturing what does.

"We are always evolving and not trying to fit families to services that don't really fit them," Caskey said. Research shows early intervention and prevention reduce incarceration rates, and IMPACT plans to incorporate more of each into its plan.

Jacalyn Whittington is the director of student services for the St. Vrain Valley School District. She coordinates the majority of services outside of traditional education, such as truancy and drop-out prevention resources, gifted and talented programs and special education. For the past three years Whittington has represented the school district on IMPACT's collaborative board. She brings 35 years of experience in education to the table and believes in the organization.

"I've never worked in a school district that has had this type of collaboration," Whittington said. "It's what all educators strive for but don't know how to be a part of."

Other counties in Colorado and other states strive to do what Boulder County IMPACT has been doing for years, she said.

The consistent, inter-agency collaboration's unified message focuses on students' strengths rather than punishing their weaknesses, Whittington said, calling it something that produces more effective outcomes and long-term student success.

"It's really kind of an overwhelming experience just to see people dedicating a significant portion of their time outside of their regularly assigned job and looking at not just to what do I need to be responsible for, but what is the greater good, the bigger picture," Whittington said.

Research shows that even a short time in jail increases the chance of recidivism, she said, while keeping youths out of jail and in school means a safer community in the future.

"When we have well-educated kids, they are going to give back to our community when they finish high school because they are engaged in it and attached to our community."

change as part of a team of dedicated, compassionate individuals.”

The people at the association also work to change public perceptions of people with disabilities.

“People with disabilities are not passive recipients of care or a drain on public dollars,” Wonnacott said. “They are active, contributing members of our community. The degree to which we can provide the appropriate and necessary support, the more we benefit as a community.”

The association’s goals are not about creating dependency but instead helping families, caregivers and people living with developmental disabilities to foster confidence in their own ability to advocate for themselves, and to promote self-sufficiency.

“I think it’s really important for people here to understand that we’re a human rights organization,” Wonnacott said. “We have a long way to go in protecting the civil rights of people with disabilities. The association is often the only organization that stands between the happy, healthy and safe life a person should be leaving, and living in a makeshift refugee camp. We get people to the table and ensure they are given the opportunity to speak. When they cannot, we will speak for them.”

comprehensive services — from education to nutrition — to low-income families and their children.

“I have elders who’ve spent their lifetime in education and are begging to be part of this volunteering in the classroom,” Raderman said, referring to matching of elders with children as a win-win situation. “My work is as the connector.”

Working with a $250,000 annual budget, Raderman, who has a background in health-care administration and medical marketing, admitted that her reach is limited even though her ideas are not. “We could easily quadruple what we do if I had the resources.”

Raderman hopes to inspire business sponsors and corporate underwriters to use her program as a way to increase their community visibility and “to work for the greater good.”

Pro-bono business developers, private donors, complimentary ticket donations and volunteers are needed to stretch the Circle of Care reach.

“This is more of a movement than a program,” Raderman said. “We’re building a healthier, more inclusive community that makes all of us feel that we belong to something.”
