Not since the invention of the nail gun has the construction industry encountered so many technological developments that are revolutionizing—and streamlining—how builders design, construct and renovate buildings.

Indeed, if you Google “construction tech” and look at the lists of technology taking the industry by storm, you’ll see virtual reality and augmented reality, drones, robotics, building information modeling, exoskeletons for workers, wearable tech to promote safety and more.

The changes are coming at a rapid pace, enabling architects, engineers and contractors to speed through jobs like never before, with greater precision and attention to detail, and with greater customer satisfaction to boot.

Fortune magazine recently asserted that the construction industry nationwide, which has lagged behind other industries in use of technology, could gain $1.6 trillion in savings if it brings its productivity in line with other sectors of the economy.

In conversations with a few Boulder Valley and Northern Colorado companies in the building trades, here are a few real-world applications of technology that at one time was confined to the holodeck on Star Trek or super secret national defense strategies.

Geomatics

Engineering firm Lamp Ryneerson, with offices in Omaha, Kansas City, Lakewood and Windsor, groups several new technologies under the geomatics label. Geomatics is the collection and analysis of data related to the earth’s surface. Traditional surveying fits into that definition, but so do digital scanning of surfaces or structures, bathymetry or underwater topography, and volumetric surveying.

In essence, the company uses new digital tools to gather and then map data points in ways that help the company create three-dimensional models of things like mine shafts or reservoir bottoms. Lamp Ryneerson has hired a technologist from the gaming industry to marry engineering data with 3D gaming presentations that simply and accurately portray what a customer needs to see to make decisions about a project.

“We’re able to show investors what they’re investing in,” said Warren Headlee, geomatics group leader for the company.

Depending on the scanner used, the company can achieve representations of vast areas on or under the earth accurate to the centimeter or millimeter. It used the technology recently to make certain that a massive, pre-built bridge to be set in place with multiple cranes would actually hit the pre-built attachment points. It did.

Bathymetric technology uses a GPS unit on top of the water and a sonar unit underwater. Using either a remote control boat or manually operated boat, the firm traverses a reservoir to determine capacities and whether any areas need to be dredged to provide more storage space for water.

The company recently surveyed

Jackson Reservoir near Fort Morgan — a process that took about 40 hours. Before this technology, surveying the lake bottom might not have been possible with any degree of accuracy.

Cory Westholms, who works from the Windsor office, said he and others from the engineering company recently provided information necessary for flood recovery work on an area southwest of Berthoud. Floodwaters changed a creek channel to go around a dam. Using aerial topography generated with a drone, the company mapped the area before and after the repairs.

“It took a couple of days [with the drone] and we have more data than we’ve ever had with traditional methods,” said Westholms. Before this technology, it would have taken weeks to do the traditional surveys, he said.

Up on the roof

Commercial roofers, also, are using drones to help them determine the best approach to handle roof restorations. Drones can accurately map roofs, but equally as important, using infrared technology can help determine where heat loss is occurring and what areas might need special attention.

Bill Steeves, who operates Roof Restoration Inc., a Loveland company, said that material choices have enabled his company to help building owners restore roofs less expensively than had been the case in the past.

It depends, of course, on roof conditions and the circumstances where the building exists, he said. But often he can apply thermoplastic polyolefin, or TPO, roofs or silicone roof coatings to bring down costs.

TPO is applied from large rolls. Silicone is applied as a liquid that hardens. Depending on the process, the cost might be as low as $3 or $4 per square foot.

Unlike most roofing products, silicone is manufactured without petroleum components, and it doesn't degrade under the ultraviolet rays from the sun.

"It isn't a cure-all, but on viable candidates it saves money and energy," Steeves said. Silicone is also fairly stable in price because it's made from an abundant natural element.

Virtual Reality/Augmented Reality

VR and AR are techniques that use real data — such as locations of walls or furniture — and extend that reality using computer simulation so that participants can have a near-real-life feel for how they fit in the environment.

And regional architectural firms and contractors are finding that they can improve their services to customers by employing it.

While the technology is sweeping the industry, a couple of the firms that began using it in the past year are Rodwin Architecture in Boulder and Elder Construction with headquarters in Windsor.

They've found that the technology increases accuracy of design and construction, prevents errors and gives the owner of building projects a pre-construction look at how they'll interact with the space being built for them.

It can be especially useful for small manufacturers or medical professionals or retailers that might build only one or two structures in a career.

"They [the owner] might not understand the spatial relationships that are represented on a drawing," said Jaren Allred, virtual design and construction manager for Elder.

Elder has a dental office specialty niche, among others, and Allred cited a specific application that the firm has used.

"A dentist [using VR] can sit in an exam room and see exactly where a tool will be placed within the design. The dentist might want it five inches one way or another to avoid having to reach for it," he said.

VR can also bring in data such as the position of the sun at all times of the day and year. That can permit an outdoor balcony, for example, to be visualized at times when it is most likely to be used. VR permits Elder to make changes before construction is underway or done.

Scott Rodwin, owner of Rodwin Architecture, designs both commercial and residential structures. He said it's particularly useful in a couple of instances.

"A first-time builder of a home might not be used to seeing blueprints," he said. Virtual reality gives that owner of a new home a chance to experience it while it can be easily changed.

In commercial projects, which have larger open spaces, the customer is able to see how light enters the space, how finishing textures look, whether there are reflections, Rodwin said.

"Houses have individual rooms but a commercial structure like a restaurant has large spaces and the overall ambiance of the building needs to be considered," Rodwin said. He recently designed a restaurant, and the VR enabled the customer to move through the whole space, to see the palette of materials, and to get a sense for how lighting and colors would work.

The technology has become powerful because of changes in how buildings are designed. No longer are building plans created on a drafting table with a T-square and pencils of multiple densities and points.

"Architects were trained to visualize in three dimensions but convert to two dimensions," Rodwin said. Now, building plans are created in three-dimensions instead of two using digital programs. And all the data from the 3D program can be exported to a virtual reality or augmented reality program to create a pre-construction experience.

Allred said he considers himself fortunate to work for a company that embraces technology. "We want to be a disrupter in the industry, to be ahead of things and to make ripples in how things work," Allred said. VR and AR provide that opportunity.

COURTESY NORTHERN WATER

Carter Lake, part of the Colorado-Big Thompson system, holds water that is treated for use by the Central Weld water district.

BY JEFF THOMAS
news@bizwest.com

The spokesman for the Northern Colorado Water Conservancy District was recollecting that when he started working at the district the cost of Colorado-Big Thompson (C-BT) water was around $600 to $700 per unit.

"We heard that a couple of weeks ago there were some units sold at $40,000," said Brian Werner, who started that job in the early 1980s.

In Northern Colorado, CB-T is pretty much the coin of the realm, every bit as much of a benchmark as West Texas Intermediate is to crude oil. But it is also extremely useful water, easily put into use by most Northern Colorado municipalities. CB-T has an average yield of about 0.7 acre foot per unit, but that amount that can be increased in times of short supply.

And while $40,000 might sound like sticker shock to area developers, that's a price that doesn't look to be falling any time in the near future, even if they can locate any C-BT for sale. Nobody is talking about projects being delayed by water scarcity at the present, but then again a lot of them aren't talking at all.

"In my view the water market is as tight as it's ever been. By a standard of price, which can be fairly objective, C-BT is at an all-time high," said Jeff Kahn, who has been a water attorney at Lyons Gaddis in Longmont since 1985. "Also anecdotally, (judging) by the availability and the places that folks need water. Naturally all the low-hanging fruit is gone, and it's become much more difficult to find water on the market."

Kahn said today developers are looking for alternatives to C-BT, often looking for nearby stream rights that might work for their development. Increasingly, he said, both municipalities and developers are looking at non-potable sources that can be used for irrigation on public spaces, as well as limiting lot size or the amount of grass that is put on residential lots.

That could become increasingly important for more eastern cities on the Front Range. Native water on the land out east often has to be augmented to be used as a treated source, whereas using it for irrigation would be far less costly.

Municipalities are often hesitant to use anything but fairly pristine water for potable sources. The water previously used for irrigation on the farms out east is often more expensive to treat and residents might object to the taste, although Aurora is developing South Platt water on the eastern plains.

Bruce Johnson, owner of Johnson and Associates in Greeley, has been a water broker here since 1978 and has never seen the market anywhere this tight.

"When things were fast and furious, I might have moved 800 to 1,000 acre feet (a year)," he said. "Last year I might have moved 20."

Both Kahn and Johnson said newer communities, at least new to growth, are incredibly reliant on C-BT, as they didn't have the opportunity to develop their supplies over the last 150 years, as did Boulder, Fort Collins, Loveland, Longmont and Greeley.

Most cities require that large developments bring in their own water, although cash-in-lieu of water is allowed for smaller developments, and by some cities for larger developments. The city of Greeley last year took the rather incredible step of offering a cash-in-lieu-of program for the first time in its history.

Johnson noted that water usually has to be dedicated at the time that actual construction begins, and developers often don't source water until they are ready for that to happen. "You see a lot of paper subdivisions in Frederick and Firestone," he noted.

Representatives from Frederick and Firestone did not return calls for comment, but Dacono City Manager AJ Euckert said he doesn't believe that development projects were being stalled by lack of water. The city is taking measures to extend water resources looking at lot sizes and encouraging the use of non-potable water for irrigation, he said.

"We are trying to bridge the gap to when NISP (the Northern Integrated Supply Project) comes in," he said. "It has been hard to source (water) for bigger filings, but we're working with Central Weld (Water Conservancy District) to bridge this gap."

In fact, many municipalities are waiting on the $1.1 billion NISP project from Northern Water, but it's at least 10 years down the road — perhaps even longer for a potentially controversial project. Northern had hoped to have the Windy Gap firming project under construction at this time, but legal challenges have delayed that project, which is not expected to put new water on the market in any case.

The Northern Integrated Supply Project will include a large reservoir, called Glade Reservoir, that will be built north of Fort Collins and force relocation of U.S. Highway 287.

Stan Linker, the district manager for Central Weld, said while his district treats water for Frederick, Firestone and Dacono, it's up to those cities to find the water. The district treatment plant is just below Carter Lake, which is part of the C-BT reservoir system.

Central Weld itself is responsible for only about 2,300 taps, mostly rural residential and ag properties.

"We're participants in NISP; we're in it for 3,500 acre feet," he said. "We're always in the market for C-BT if it comes in at a reasonable price, but there's not that much out there now."

Construction labor demands are now exceeding pre-recession levels and a labor shortage fueled in part by an aging workforce has driven up costs and delayed projects, but general contractors aren't necessarily losing sleep over the situation.

"Certainly the market, as a whole, wants to build more projects," said Michael Gifford, president of the Associated General Contractors (ACG) of Colorado. "But capitalism is interesting in that everyone behaves in their own best self-interest."

Some general contractors are simply picking and choosing their projects with both their own bottom lines and available subcontractors in mind, while some more established GCs say they aren't experiencing any great worker shortage. But according to a recent ACG study, 85 percent of respondents said they are experiencing difficulty filling some or all of their needed workforce.

"In 2007, we had 170,000 construction workers in this state, and that includes all of the jobs, highway, commercial and residential," Gifford said. "By 2011, we were down to 105,000. Today we are at 175,000, and I'll go out on a limb and say we could use another 22,000 workers."

"So how did we get from 105 to 175? I think it's mostly recruitment and training," Gifford said.

Doug Dohn, president of Fort Collins-based Dohn Construction Inc., said he is seeing more subcontracting crews — especially in framing, drywall, painting and concrete flatwork — coming in from out of state, but that has done little to bring down labor costs.

"There are way more now than five years ago, and their first job may be less expensive," Dohn said. "But when they get to their second or third job, they've figured out the price of housing and labor and their prices start climbing."

But in shorter supply are the more skilled trades people in electrical, plumbing and heating and air conditioning. That labor shortage has become a very limiting factor in how much work his company is willing to take on, Dohn said.

"Our subcontractors can only take on the amount of work they have people available for, so we're being very selective on our projects — people we've worked with before and projects close to home," he said. "Our work is much closer to home than it's been in a number of years, and our good people work here because they don't have to drive."

Tom Roche, president and CEO of Roche Constructors Inc. of Greeley, echoed many of those same thoughts. He said there does seem to be a labor shortage across the board, including college-educated management personnel, but it hasn't dramatically affected his company.

"We seem to work with a good set of subcontractors, and we've been able to attract good people when we need them," he said. "We experience it, but we're careful with the type of projects we take."

"In the downturn, contractors like us were looking at every kind of project; we had a lot more competition," Roche said. "Now we can be more selective and find the right kinds of projects for us."

Roche said he believes that some general contractors are having a more difficult time finding subcontractors or personnel, but having been in business for 48 years is an advantage when it comes to staffing. "We like to think we treat our subcontractors fairly and expect them to perform."

Gifford said the economic downturn coincided with another national event, referred to as the "Silver Tsunami," the retirement of many skilled Baby Boomer construction workers. That has cast a long shadow over finding people in those skilled trades.

His organization actually spent quite a bit of cash advertising for such skilled workers in locations such as Detroit and Las Vegas, hoping to lure out-of-work construction specialists to the Front Range. "They didn't come. It proved very difficult to convince someone to move for $20 an hour."

Instead, ACG Colorado has focused on attracting the underemployed already here in Colorado.

"We're recruiting people who are fast food workers, stocking shelves, or just graduated," Gifford said. "They're going from $12 [an hour] to $17 and in a year they're over $20."

ACG's study, which was conducted by Colorado State University, estimated that the construction labor force will have to grow by at least an additional 30,000 people by 2023. "We're doing it by pulling people from the underemployed sector," he said.

ACG also does substantial training in construction estimation, so companies can keep their good workers on a career track. Training estimators for the more difficult design/build work is very important, he said.

Schick:

Housing remains strong despite 'normalization of market'

BY CHRIS WOOD

Dennis Schick, broker/owner with Re/Max Alliance, speaker at BizWest's Northern Colorado Real Estate Summit in March 2019.

LOVELAND — Northern Colorado's housing market remains strong, with solid sales and a wave of new developments coming online. But inventories are increasing as prices climb, according to Dennis Schick, broker/owner with Re/Max Alliance.

Schick delivered the Residential Forecast at BizWest's Northern Colorado Real Estate Summit in March at the Embassy Suites by Hilton in Loveland.

Schick said that 21,209 closings occurred in the Information and Real Estate Services LLC multiple-listing-service region during 2018, down 2.7 percent from the prior year. But smaller communities recorded huge increases in activity, with Severance up 225.2 percent, Firestone up 66.7 percent, Timnath up 60.8 percent, Windsor up 44.2 percent and Lyons up 27.8 percent.

New listings displayed a similar trend, with Severance, Firestone, Timnath, Nederland and Windsor leading the region.

As the market cools, inventory is increasing, Schick said. Homes on the market totaled 2,983 last year, up 10.9 percent from 2017. Communities such as Louisville, Frederick and Firestone doubled inventory from the prior year, while Superior recorded a 71.4 percent increase in homes on the market.

That higher inventory means that buyers enjoy more choices when it comes to housing.

Schick noted that median home prices continue to climb, up 5.6 percent regionwide in 2018. The greatest gain? Red Feather Lakes, up 22.4 percent, following by Nederland at 19.9 percent, Morgan County at 18.5 percent, Lyons at 17.8 percent and Berthoud at 16.7 percent.

Overall, Schick said, Larimer County

"We have seen a blast of new builders come in to Northern Colorado."

median home prices climbed 78 percent from 2010 through 2018, while Weld County's increased 112 percent.

Helping somewhat with inventory have been national builders joining local home builders, he said.

"We have seen a blast of new builders come in to Northern Colorado," Schick said, along with "lots of local builders that have found several places in the marketplace where they can be profitable."

Looking to the future, Schick said Weld County has "a lot of good activity coming on, a lot of it." He ticked off a wave of projects throughout Northern Colorado, including Greeley, Berthoud, Loveland, Fort Collins and many other communities. That will create additional inventory for agents to sell, giving Schick optimism that years of strong sales will continue.

"The doom and gloom are out there," Schick said. "The 'R' word [Recession] keeps getting attention. Are we heading for a recession? This country is always just heading toward a recession or just coming out of one. I think we are doing fantastic in Northern Colorado. Have we felt a little bit of a blip? It's a normalization of the market, guys. It is not the end of all ends."

"We are still bringing good buyers and sellers together all over Northern Colorado," he added.

But builders face many hurdles, including the cost of water, construction costs, land costs and other factors, likely leading to continued price appreciation.

Migration, not births, drives area's population

COURTESY STATE OF COLORADO

BY KEN AMUNDSON
kamundson@bizwest.com

LOVELAND — Colorado and Northern Colorado will continue to grow over the coming years, but it won't be because of births. Rather, in-migration will be the primary driver of population growth, according to Elizabeth Garner, Colorado's state demographer.

Garner addressed the BizWest Northern Colorado Real Estate Summit held at the Embassy Suites by Hilton in Loveland in March.

"We're seeing a significant slowdown in growth," she said, meaning that the state will need to compete vigorously to continue to attract the best and brightest — which has been the case over the past several years.

Most of the population growth in the state has been along the Interstate 25 corridor, with Northern Colorado driving much of that, she said. About a third of the state's counties are in decline, she said.

Garner noted that there are two components to population growth or decline — births minus deaths and in-migration versus out-migration.

While it seems like growth in Colorado is record-setting, the 1990s actually had faster growth, she said. The state has experienced downward pressure on births since 2007. The number of babies born now is actually below the replacement rate, meaning migration into the state is playing a larger role in growth.

With fewer births, household sizes (and the need for larger homes) will largely decline, she said.

In the region, Larimer County has seen "downward pressure" on in-migration, but Weld has seen the opposite. Weld County has also seen more natural growth through births than Larimer County. Boulder County has seen an even steeper decline in births, which to a large extent is driven by housing prices. "That's what happens when people can't afford to live there," Garner said.

Garner said Weld's relative increase in births and in-migration has much to do with affordability. Young families can afford to live there, given wages and housing prices, she said. And it feeds on itself: "Young people are attracted to other young people, who then create even younger people," she said.

The state as a whole is attracting 170,000 to 210,000 people a year but also loses 80,000 to 90,000, she said.

She noted a "huge relationship" between Larimer and Weld. The biggest population donor county to Larimer is Weld, and vice versa, she said.

Jobs drive migration within the state and into the state. "We are forecasting slower job growth into the future, and we are also forecasting slower migration. We'll see a movement of people out of the labor force (as they age) but not leaving the state," she said.

Garner examined commuting patterns, because that information helps to determine where people want to live and buy property.

She said 46,000 people commute into Larimer daily, and 54,000 commute out. For Weld, 41,000 commute in and 80,000 commute out.

"If you're involved in real estate, and you know commuting is an important factor, how does that affect your relationship with your customer. Where are the transportation corridors, the bus corridors?" she asked.

Elizabeth Garner, Colorado's state demographer, keynote speaker at BizWest's Northern Colorado Real Estate Summit in March 2019.

"The pattern tells you that people pick a location to live and their job is secondary."

Housing prices are a factor. So is the ratio between incomes and prices. That ratio in Colorado and Larimer County is 4.6, 6.0 in Denver but 3.6 in Weld County and the nation as a whole. That means younger people in particular will find greater housing affordability in Weld, which explains why significantly more people commute out of the county for their jobs but choose to live in Weld.

Those in the real estate industry need to pay attention to age cohorts as they move through the population. The peak population now is 28 to 30 years old — the age when people often buy their first homes. The cohort following that peak population is smaller, which suggests that fewer first homes will be purchased in the years to come.

On the other end of the spectrum, those 65 and older is not expanding as a population cohort, and individuals of that age are not relocating at the same degree as younger populations.

Garner said the population trends also have an impact on the workforce. "We are seeing older workers staying in the workforce longer. And thank God. We'd be seeing even more difficulty filling jobs without that," she said.

Eric Thompson, president of Windermere Colorado, introduces a panel discussion about the supply of housing in Northern Colorado. On the panel were, from left, Lauren Hansen, CEO of IRES; Ron Harding, appraiser with Northern Colorado Appraisals; and Robbie Miner, broker associate and partner with Sears Real Estate in Greeley.

Demand expected to outstrip supply for years to come

kamundson@bizwest.com

LOVELAND — The dearth of homes for sale in Northern Colorado can perhaps be characterized in one statistic: There are more Realtors and appraisers in the Information and Real Estate Services region than there are new homes for sale.

"There's not a lot of pie to go around," said Robbie Miner, broker associate and partner with Sears Real Estate in Greeley.

Miner was part of a panel discussion March 5, 2019 at BizWest's Northern Colorado Real Estate Summit at the Embassy Suites by Hilton. Joining him on the panel were Ron Harding, an appraiser with Northern Colorado Appraisals, and Lauren Hansen, CEO of IRES. Eric Thompson, president of Windermere Colorado, moderated the discussion.

They gathered to discuss the implications of the low housing inventory on the marketplace.

Hansen said she has 7,000 users of the IRES system in an area that includes most of northeast Colorado, including Larimer and Weld counties. That number has grown from about 4,800 in the past 10 years, she said.

A third of the membership has been in the real estate business for two years or less, she said.

She displayed charts showing how inventory of real estate for sale has gone up and down, with the predominant trend being down. She said the region is seeing the impact of new construction, but it hasn't been enough to meet demand, and what is available comes at a high price point. Inventory under $400,000 in purchase price has declined significantly, she said.

The median home sale price in Fort Collins is $409,000, $390,000 in Loveland/Berthoud, $492,000 in Estes Park (up 12.7 percent year over year) and $300,000 in Greeley/Evans.

On a national level, median home prices are increasing about 2.2 percent, considerably less than in Northern Colorado.

Growth areas for new homes often are in smaller communities, where land is more available and at lower prices. The most new homes sold last year in the region was in Severance, Miner said, with 417 new-home sales recorded in IRES last year. Close behind was Windsor, with 346 units sold. Those two communities accounted for about half of all new homes sold last year in the Weld/Larimer county area.

In Northern Colorado, new-home sales account for about 20 percent of all home sales.

Miner said that home developers "are doing a good job right now, but there aren't enough of them."

Home affordability in the new-home market is affected significantly by price of land and water. "People are fighting over C-BT [Colorado-Big Thompson Project] shares. This affects affordability," Miner said.

Miner said he is most concerned about the medium-sized builder who might construct between 20 and 80 homes a year. That builder is unable to keep enough lot inventory to maintain operations over years, unlike the large builder that buys land in 100-lot parcels.

"The middle-size builder doesn't have enough runway to sustain operations," he said.

With inventory of homes for sale at such limited numbers, the panel said that sellers can get the best prices by keeping their properties in good condition.

In fact, condition may be one of the most important factors that the appraiser considers, said Harding, who has appraised homes in Northern Colorado since 2010.

"We look at whether the home has been remodeled or updated or not, whether it is clean. Don't make the appraiser nervous" [because of the condition and cleanliness], he said.

All appraisals of the same property by different appraisers should come in within 5 percent of each other, Harding said. An audience member said he has seen differences in appraisals when solar features are involved. Hansen said national statistics suggest that solar can add $10,000 to the price of a home. The audience member said one appraiser will add 50 percent of the installed price for solar to the valuation and the next might not add anything.

Harding said appraisals can be challenged but need to be challenged with the lender.

Blueprints

Is your company included?

Need a drywall? An electrician?

Or perhaps you have a mighty project and are looking for an architect, a builder—the whole nine yards?

No matter what your building-related project or interest, what you need most is Blueprints. In it, you'll find in-depth contact listings for almost 2,000 companies, and important news and headlines from the front lines of one of the region's most-important industries.

Contact BizWest Research to add your information to the next edition — it's free! You'll also be added to the DataStore database, accessed daily by colleagues and competitors for the most up-to-date information on the industry in the Boulder Valley and in Northern Colorado.
