Farm-to-table depends on finding local producers

Aaron Rice checks on some of the pigs in his herd, which come to market weight by grazing in a pasture.

KEN AMUNDSON/BIZWEST

By Ken Amundson
kamundson@bizwest.com

WELLINGTON — Colorado Proud, now 20 years old. Farm-to-table. Farmer's markets. Organic vegetables, fruit and meat.

All of these things and more have grown out of the undeniable movement of many people to get closer to their food — to get closer to where food is produced and away from mass-produced, assembly line operations that raise, slaughter, package and ship without regard to the specific person who will consume.

Restaurants across Northern Colorado and the Boulder Valley have adopted practices to source their menu items from local producers whenever possible. And not just any local producer; favored among the farm-to-table restaurants are those farms that engage in sustainable practices, where animals and crops are one with the land and producing organic products as much as possible.

And that's the premise of one Northern Colorado farm-to-table producer, Jodar Farms, located two miles north of Wellington.

The farm is the first in what Poudre Valley Community Farms hopes will be a network of small producers leasing land from a land cooperative — an effort to make land available to young, startup farmers who could not otherwise afford to buy or lease land.

Jodar benefits from the co-op, which bought 109 acres that at one time was home to a dairy operation. Jodar uses the land to produce pastured chickens and hogs in a method reminiscent of farming practices from earlier decades.

Chickens, both broilers and egg-laying hens, wander all about the property. The chicks of multiple breeds are staged so that not all are the same age and thus come of age at multiple times during the year. The same is true of the hogs, with all having access to pasture ground where they can roll in the mud and graze on fresh grass.

The egg layers, 3,000 currently, produce white, brown and green eggs — yes, eggs are naturally green from Americana chickens. Since the chickens are free range, most lay eggs in established nests but some insist upon building their own nests in corners of buildings or in the shade of a farm structure. A chicken will lay in excess of 250 eggs a year, so the current stock produces three quarters of a million eggs a year — almost all of which are sold wholesale to farm-to-table restaurants or to CSA — community supporting agriculture — members who buy shares of the stock in order to get access to the fresh eggs produced on the farm.

Barns, all small and on skids, are moved regularly so that the chickens have fresh places to peck and so that the farmland benefits from the inevitable manure that comes with any chicken.

Aaron Rice, who with his wife Ria, own the operation and work in concert with Aaron's father, Doug, said that moving the chickens around the farm, and feeding them a diet of spent brewery grains from six local breweries, balanced commercial feeds, and natural food such as plants and bugs, gives the eggs a flavor profile that is unlike what a consumer might find in grocery store eggs.

Jodar Farms began as Doug Rice's hobby. Doug Rice is a former police officer who worked in Longmont and then Fort Collins. He ended his 27-year law enforcement career as an investigator for the district attorney's office in Larimer County.

"I knew early on I wanted a farm," Rice said. "Police officers need to be able to get away from their daily work, so I bought 40 acres," he said. His farm is east of Fort Collins just north of Colorado Highway 14.

He started to raise a few laying hens and pigs for the family. "Then other police officers heard about it and asked me to raise a hog or chicken for them." Soon he was producing eggs and chickens for more than that, and using a USDA certified slaughter facility near Nunn. That facility closed, which meant that he could no longer produce meat chickens for sale, but he could sell memberships in his operation where the ultimate consumer owns the birds that they will eventually harvest. About 200 people take advantage of those memberships each year.

Aaron Rice, who holds a geology degree from Colorado State University, came to his dad after graduation and said, "I want to turn your hobby into a business." The business name, Jodar Farms, comes from Doug Rice's background. He was at one time a juvenile officer, and he became known in the police department by JODAR, juvenile officer Doug Allen Rice. "I don't think some of them [police officers] knew my real name," he said.

Aaron, with no ag background other than what he picked up from his father, has immersed himself in his profession. Using online videos, experts from CSU and elsewhere in the ag community, and trial and error he has figured out how to grow chickens and hogs, and produce eggs and sausage, in a way sought after by farm-to-table wholesale customers, by CSA members, and by customers at farmers markets in Denver, Boulder and Longmont.

The farm's bounty taken to farmers markets is often gone by 9 a.m. CSA members get preference because of the contracts they sign.

"People want their fresh, local chicken, but there's none to buy [wholesale or retail]," Doug Rice said. That's because licensing of meat chicken processing facilities can be a major hurdle for small operators, he said. Rice knew of only two such operations in the state.

Jodar has found a USDA licensed processing plant for larger animals such as the hogs it raises and occasional lambs. Innovative Foods LLC at Evans handles that work, which then enables Jodar to sell the packaged meat at farmers markets or to farm-to-table restaurants. Eventually, Jodar would like to create a farm store for retail sale.

Clinton Wilson, executive director of Poudre Valley Community Farms, said the Rice operation is exactly what the cooperative, financed by people interested in conserving farmland and providing the means for small farmers to stay on the land, had in mind when it got underway. The co-op is currently working on a smaller parcel, about 40 acres just west of the Anheuser Busch brewery, that if successful will be used to grow vegetables.

"We try to buy land at agricultural rates, not development prices," Wilson said. "Our lease rates are at the low end of market lease rates," he said.

The arrangement works out well for regional restaurants that want locally grown food. Jodar sells its products, mostly eggs, to several, including Jax Fish House, The Regional, Cafe Vino, Ginger & Baker, and Little Bird Bake Shop, all in Fort Collins.

Ginger & Baker advertises "pasture raised eggs" on its website, as do several of the others.

"There is such a flavor difference between regular eggs we can buy at the store and those we get farm raised," said Amy Stacy, head chef at Jax.

She said it took awhile to develop a relationship with Jodar, because the farm had to ramp up its production by raising more laying hens in order to accommodate Jax.

"It's worth the challenge and the dollar amount to bring in a higher priced ingredient to make our menu items," she said.

Private venue

helps companies make deals

The Bradley Boulder Inn caters to intimate business meetings involving people who don't want to be overheard.

By Dan England
news@bizwest.com

BOULDER — On most visits to a coffee house, restaurant or bar in Boulder, Terry Tierney finds himself looking over his shoulder.

Tierney isn't a mob boss, or James Bond's right-hand man, but he still worries about overhearing ears or prying eyes as a top executive with Daiya Foods. The natural foods industry is hot in Colorado and especially in Boulder, where it seems as if an abnormal chunk of its population won't eat anything that isn't vegan, gluten-free and organic. That means big business deals for Daiya, and that's why Tierney insists on the Bradley Inn to make them happen. The downtown 12-room inn has a reputation for its delectable breakfast, unique and luxurious spaces and location just a half-block from Pearl Street, one of the more well-known shopping districts in the state. But the Bradley's also attracted executives such as Tierney for its privacy.

The inn was built in 1994 as the Coburn Hotel, six years before it became the Bradley, to look like a mansion, not a hotel, and to blend into the residential neighborhood, so it's already undercover, in a sense. It offers just enough space away from Pearl Street's crowds, and the Inn's small size essentially prevents the chance that CEOs will run into rival executives, employees or reporters from BizWest at a larger hotel.

"That happens all the time in Boulder," Tierney said.

In fact, Tierney's overheard other conversations about business deals while grabbing a cup of coffee, even from others who were speaking softly or otherwise obviously didn't want others to hear them.

"The biggest thing, if you can imagine, is say you're being acquired, and it's a public company," said Heather Collaton, the owner of the Bradley. "You don't want to run into the heavy hitters in a hotel lobby. That's why we're seeing this kind of business. You have to seek us out. You won't even realize it's a hotel."

The Bradley's business clients tend to come most often in the fall until early March, when her summer vacation crowds are back home, and some will book the entire hotel for a week, if possible. She has regular clients such as Tierney, but she also has businesses discussing acquisitions, start-ups discussing new beginnings and board retreats discussing everything in between. The Bradley does not allow children under 14, and it doesn't allow bachelor parties either, because both can interfere with the quiet and comfortable atmosphere it markets.

The Bradley compares well with Boul-der's many five-star hotels, and it does offer perks such as a wine and cheese hour, home-made cookies and coffee, but it's not overtly luxurious, Collaton said.

"It's designed to be a place where you can pound out some work," she said. "We've hit a sweet spot. There's a market out there now for smaller, private, well-located hotels."

Privacy, even secrecy, is in fact a nationwide trend, said Eric Shoup, CEO of Peerspace, a Website that offers 13,000 meeting spaces across 1,400 cities in the U.S. for booking.

"We host our own board meetings in Peerspace locations because we want to speak openly about things in our company and not have employee ears around," Shoup said in a phone interview.

Alternative meeting spaces remain a hot trend as a result. Peerspace's business has doubled every year in the five years it's been a company, Shoup said, as businesses book art galleries, concert venues and even living rooms.

"People are trying to get out of the hotel conference room," he said.

That doesn't mean hotels are hurting in the meeting market. The Bradley didn't want it to sound as if it's the only place to host a meeting, and Peerspace does offer hotels regardless if they want to be listed, Shoup said, but even those tend to be local chains. Businesses just want a choice.

David Davino prefers to bring clients for OptTek Systems in Boulder to the Bradley because many tend to be international and are much more comfortable in smaller inns, which are the norm back in their countries. But they also prefer a quiet place.

"I know a couple of my large clients are very careful about data and felt more comfortable being in a small environment," Davino said.

Davino stays there himself after taking the job with OptTek in 2016. He lives in New Jersey and flies in every other week to work a few days. The company suggested the Bradley.

"I've been there ever since," he said.

Thousands of artists and patrons attend the annual Sculpture in the Park at Benson Park each August.

BIZWEST/KEN AMUNDSON

Art in the Park is one of three art festivals on the same weekend in Loveland. This arts and craft fair is in North Lake Park.

By Jeff Thomas
news@bizwest.com

To say that Northern Colorado really hums over the summer festival season is a bit of an understatement these days, but in early August that was doubled as Fort Collins hosted the Bohemian Nights NewWestFest and Loveland hosted three art events.

"It seems it's usually every weekend now. The weekend before it was Cheyenne Frontier Days," said Lisa Goss, manager of the Travelodge by Wyndham in Loveland. She said the hotel is routinely book fairly full over the summer months, but that definitely was enhanced by Loveland's three art festivals; the Sculpture in the Park Show and Sale, the Loveland Fine Art Invitational, and Art in the Park.

The Bohemian Nights shows drew an estimated 100,000 music fans over three days, Aug 9-11, while the arts shows in Loveland drew about 15,000. And while the Greeley Stampede and Frontier Days rodeos and music shows might still be the biggest bookers of hotel rooms in this very northern part of Colorado, it's clear that many other festivals and events are also taking up some slack during summer months.

"We are seeing a good increase in festivals and events in Fort Collins. In fact, this position was just created five years ago," said Jan Sawyer, the special events coordinator in Fort Collins. "Certainly in the past 15 years, we've had a very active festival and event scene."

Sawyer said the NewWestFest was pretty much a smaller arts and crafts show, until Bohemian Nights became involved with the music portion in 2005. Today, the festival, which benefits the Downtown Fort Collins Business Association, is by far the largest festival by the number of participants, Sawyer said, but hardly the only game in town.

"The FORTitude 10K covers the most ground in Fort Collins, it gets about 15,000" participants, volunteers and fans, Sawyer said. She said the vast majority of festivals in Fort Collins are from local nonprofits. For instance, the Peach Festival benefits local Rotary clubs.

The NewWestFest benefits the Fort Collins Downtown Business Association, and as all events are held downtown it benefits its members even more, said James Yearling, deputy director at the DBA.

"We unfortunately don't have comprehensive economic impact data regarding Bohemian Nights at NewWestFest (beds, jobs, sales tax, gas and goods, etc.), though we've had peripheral conversations with Visit Fort Collins, Economic Health and CSU (Colorado State University) on how we might best measure the impact, as we'd love to have it," Yearling said. "We suspect the impact is huge."

Yearling said both last year and this August, the DBA partnered with a destination marketing company to collect information via an intercept survey.

"In 2018, over 2,200 people completed the survey, and we discovered that festival attendees spent an average of $50.71 while at the event," he said. "With an estimated attendance of over 100,000, the low-end consumer spending tops over $5,000,000 for the festival weekend. Interestingly, the survey results also showed that 35 percent of attendees were out-of-town visitors."

Economic development officials noted that sales tax numbers for the events won't be counted until next month. Often the numbers are difficult to discern as one event slides into another, but in Loveland the art fest weekend is definitely a winner.

"It's the largest revenue generating weekend for Loveland," said Kristi Elyce, the executive director of the Loveland High Plains Arts Council. The nonprofit Arts Council hosts the sculpture contest — the largest outdoor, juried sculpture contest in the nation — and donates those profits into securing more sculptures for the city's Benson Sculpture Park.

Revenue from all the two paying arts fests now tops $1.5 million, but the sculpture contest is by far the largest, so that's a lot of sculpture in the park.

"To date we've put in 179 pieces at nearly $5 million," Elyce said. The contest draws more than 1,000 people to its Patron Party — those without an invitation pay $75 apiece.

"It's primarily a national show; people are coming from across the United States," she said. "And the people who come are staying at hotels."

Still the local festivals do not appear to really sell out all the available hotel rooms up here. Loveland Embassy Suites, the largest hotel in Northern Colorado, no longer even tries to block book rooms for the art shows, said Donna Clark, the director of sales

"We don't see a big effect from the sculpture show; we're pretty much a convention hotel," she said. "We've set up room blocks before, but it really doesn't pick up."

Clark said the hotel needs to book its convention space, so that's where most of her efforts go, and people outside of business affairs tend to balk at the higher room fees. Even the big shows, such as Frontier Days and the Stampede, probably don't draw a lot of guests, she said, and the hotel continued to host its normal corporate events and conventions during the big August weekend.

However, for Joey Nesmith, a front desk agent at the Rodeway Inn in Loveland, it was a bit of a trial by fire.

"I was in training that weekend," Nesmith said. "We might have had two empty rooms all week."

TAKING CONTROL
 Strategies to Gain Visibility & Improve the Value of your Organization

Small businesses have and continue to be one of the greatest engines for job creation in the United States. However, companies often struggle to manage growth and scale. In order to truly take control of the value of your business, you must have a strategy to increase, as well as the impact of your culture, growth and efforts.

A healthcare system continues to grow in a competitive market within the healthcare industry. To ensure the company's success, the ability to manage and control the business is essential.
