Peak Form Medical Clinic is an occupational medicine clinic with locations in Boulder and Brighton. Devoted to the prevention and management of occupational and environmental injury, illness and disability, as well as the promotion of health and productivity of workers and their families, Peak Form's multidisciplinary team of doctors, physical therapists, exercise physiologists and other medical professionals spends more time with patients than industry norms, proactively delivering a higher level of care and a personal touch too often missing from today's health care providers.

A healthy workplace is not only beneficial for employees, it also benefits employers by reducing health care and related costs while creating a safer, more enjoyable working environment. Further, there are many proven benefits for employees to get back to their regular routine after an injury or illness, so partnering with Peak Form benefits employers and employees.

Uniquely suited to address workplace health care challenges, Peak Form's chief medical officer Dr. X. J. Ethan Moses is the medical director for the Colorado Division of Workers' Compensation, enabling the clinic to be trusted by hundreds of employers to care for their injured employees and partner on wellness programs.

Each year, millions of Americans develop health conditions that may temporarily or permanently remove them from the workforce. Additionally, 10% of the American population is unable to perform the physical tasks their job demands, and 75% of workers' compensation claims stem from injuries incurred by those employees. The economic impact of being out of work is untenable for many families. While workers' compensation insurance assists injured and ill workers, these programs often do not fully cover economic costs related to the injury or illness. Peak Form is deeply focused on helping companies reduce the rate of workplace injuries — in some cases by up to 50% during the first year of implementation — to bring workers' compensation costs for employers down.

"When we work with a new organization, we recommend a job analysis to help identify the most physically demanding and awkward positions that employees have to get into in order to complete certain tasks," said Jeanette Hrubes, Peak Form's CEO. "We then test prospective employees' ability to safely perform these essential job tasks."

"If a candidate is unable to safely perform one or more of the job-simulation tasks, the employer can 'withdraw' the job offer. We can also identify people that may not be able to do a task because they may have a preexisting impairment or disability. In these circumstances, we are compliant with ADAAA laws by recommending that the employer enter into an interactive discussion with the potential employee to determine whether there is a reasonable accommodation that can be made."

Peak Form also offers post-offer preemployment screenings (POPES). These screenings establish a baseline for employees before they begin work so that, in the event of an injury, the employer, employee and health care provider understand the level to which the employee needs to return and where they were prior to the injury.

Such employee screening and services not only ensure candidates are a good fit, they also help to reduce injury rates, which is crucially important. Increased injuries can both increase workers' compensation premiums as well as limit the ability to bid on certain projects if an employer's e-mod (injury rate) is too high.

Find out more about about how Peak Form's services, including physicals, drug screenings, wellness programs and injury care, will keep your employees — and your bottom line — in PEAK FORM.

RSV spikes among young, old

BY DALLAS HELTZELL

news@bizwest.com

As the spread of coronavirus dominates the world spotlight, hospitals in Northern Colorado and across the nation are dealing with a major spike in another more common respiratory ailment that's getting far less attention.

A stark warning by the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention on Feb. 25 that coronavirus — now officially called COVID-19 by the World Health Organization — soon would start spreading across the United States sent stock prices spiraling downward as government and private entities considered its potential effects on public health, productivity and global supply chains. The worldwide death toll from the virus was nearing 3,000.

Meanwhile, health experts around the country say this year is one of the worst in decades for the spread of respiratory syncytial virus. RSV affects children most but also seniors and — this year — more adults than normal. Adults more prone to coming down with RSV are predominantly seniors, pregnant women and those with special medical needs such as asthma or a chronic illness.

Medical professionals also are stressing RSV's possible impacts on businesses.

"There have been twice the amount of cases and deaths related to the flu this winter" in the United States, said Dr. Brian Money, chair of pediatrics at Banner Health's North Colorado Medical Center in Greeley. "Couple that with RSV and it's been a very hard year."

In his career that spans 35 years, Dr. Dan McGee, a pediatric hospitalist at Helen DeVos Children's Hospital in Grand Rapids, Michigan, told NBC-TV's "Today" show, "I don't know that I have ever seen RSV come on so strong so early in the season."

Not to make people panic, Money doesn't downplay concerns over coronavirus.

"I open up my news app, and I see five articles a day about coronavirus, and a lot of hysteria and worry about that," he said. "I see how it's affecting the stock market and global trading and things

The Centers for Disease Control provides health care entities, businesses, schools and others with tips for avoiding RSV, which has had a higher incidence in Northern Colorado this past year.

"But here is RSV and flu. Both of these viruses have had a particularly bad year, affecting us here. And when you look at the total number of patients getting infected with this, we see a number count going up with the coronavirus but RSV and flu are in the millions per season. RSV is not one that has as much name recognition as the flu does or ones that kind of get worked up in the media like the coronavirus or the SARS virus or Ebola. When you look at the number of cases that we see, though, it pales in comparison to these yearly recurrent viruses like RSV and flu."

Among children younger than age 5, he said, American health-care facilities usually see about 2 million outpatient visits for RSV a year, and about 60,000 hospitalizations. Older adults account for nearly 175,000 hospitalizations a year and more than 14,000 deaths. In comparison, he said, flu claims about 81,000 lives a year.

"These two viruses far outpace the frequency and severity of coronavirus," Money said. "It's been a particularly bad year for RSV in our area. RSV happens every year and anecdotally certain years are worse than others. You never know until it hits."

Banner Health facilities saw a 40 percent increase in RSV-related cases in 2019 compared with 2018, with an increase in severity as well.

"Talking with my respiratory therapists here, they're talking about how many more adult cases we're seeing this season, how many people are up in the ICU on ventilators or pressure support because of these viruses," Money said. "We're seeing the same thing on the pediatric floor, and a lot higher acuity — meaning a lot sicker patients, a lot more needing to be transferred to ICUs."

In the first two years of life, according to the CDC, RSV is the leading cause of pneumonia and bronchiolitis — a swelling of the small airways — and may be associated with wheezing.

For healthy adults, he said, "it's more like a common cold, with headache, chest cold, body aches, fever and cough," Money said, "but the younger you are and the older you are, the smaller your airways are and the more likely you are to have complications with dehydration and difficulty breathing."

The highly contagious virus often starts similar to a cold, with a runny nose and maybe a low-grade fever. As it moves into the lungs, according to the CDC, breathing becomes more difficult and symptoms usually are at their worst on the illness's third day. Our bodies never become immune to RSV; a person can catch it repeatedly during their lives, sometimes during the same season.

From a business standpoint, he said, RSV "can certainly decrease productivity at work and with sick days and job loss and the amount of time spent at home if you have kids that you have to take off to take care of them. I don't have an exact number of dollars lost with sick days per year, but I've definitely seen statistics in the past, and the numbers are relatively staggering in terms of how much money can be lost at businesses based on illnesses like this."

Health-care facilities especially feel the pinch.

"It definitely affects hospital staffing," Money said, "not just because of the increased amount of patients so that you're operating at a higher operational level, but then also our staff are on the front lines of taking care of the patients, so they're a lot more susceptible to getting the infection themselves and then having sick days."

Surveys show RSV patients had a higher use of health-care resources such as hospital stays, emergency room or urgent-care visits, ambulatory visits and outpatient visits than non-RSV patients across all age groups.

Prevention, Money said, just takes some common sense.

"The best way to try to prevent it is the traditional ways to decrease the spread of viruses: covering your cough, washing your hands, being vigilant around people who might be sick," Money said. "We all kind of get a little lazy with hand washing, but these things are important, especially when we're having a household member who has a fever or a cold."

What sets RSV apart from influenza, he said, is that vaccines are available for flu but not universally for RSV.

"There's one that exists," he said, "but you have to be a premature infant or have chronic lung or heart disease to qualify for it" under specific criteria established by the American Academy of Pediatrics.

That drug is palivizumab, which was cleared for marketing by the U.S. Food and Drug Administration in 1998. Marketed as Synagis, it's produced by Gaithersburg, Maryland-based MedImmune, which now is owned by AstraZeneca (NYSE: AZN), which produced pharmaceuticals at facilities in Boulder and Longmont until January 2019. The American Academy of Pediatrics has developed specific criteria for use of this medicine.

"That's the problem with viruses; there's no magic pill or drug that's going to make them go away any quicker," Money said. "Flu has an antiviral you can use, RSV does not. But even the effectiveness of the antiviral for flu is still minimal and has to be given within the first 48 hours of symptoms. So it's important when people start to get sick to get to their doctor's office to be evaluated. Or if they're seeing signs of difficulty breathing, they need to get in."

Businesses can help educate employees about prevention, Money said.

"The CDC has a lot of handouts and posters they can put up about proper techniques about handwashing and covering coughs," he said, "but I think the main thing to do is the same thing I tell children going to school: If you're sick, you need to stay home. If you're going to work with fever and cough and flu and cold, that's the best way to spread it to all your colleagues and co-workers, subsequently causing further loss of business days and revenue."

"I think from an employer standpoint, they need to understand and be lenient about these sick days. A lot of my patients and families worry about taking time off with their children when they're sick because they might get a negative review at work or be at risk of losing their job. But if you're coming to work sick or coming to school sick, you're just perpetuating these kinds of viruses and ultimately making everybody sicker."

"Very professional, polite, compassionate for my situation. Would love to have them both, physician and CRNA, on my healthcare team again!"

“We have significant concerns about the public option, including mandating participation [from insurers] and raising the medical loss ratio,” said Amanda Massey, executive director of the Colorado Association of Health Plans.

State begins public-option draft

BY PAULA AVEN GLADYCH

news@bizwest.com

DENVER — Colorado is close to unveiling its proposed public option for health care in the next couple of weeks. The bill that started this whole process, passed in 2019, was bipartisan in both chambers of the state Legislature.

“We all were hearing from our constituents about the high cost of health care in Colorado. We have unique challenges in Colorado that make us one of the most expensive states,” said Rep. Dylan Roberts, D-Eagle and Routt counties, one of the sponsors of the bill. “Both parties realize we need to do something on this front.”

Last year’s bill directed the Colorado Division of Insurance and Colorado Department of Health Care Policy and Financing to come up with a proposal for a public option to provide for insurance and to lower costs for services including prescription drugs. They conducted a statewide listening tour to gain public input and conducted research and an actuarial analysis to come up with a proposal that was released in November 2019.

“Now we are working off that proposal to craft that bill,” he said. So far, the bill includes some of what was in that initial proposal and other points that were brought up by stakeholders. The sponsors are hoping to have a Colorado health insurance option available in the next couple of years. Such an option would provide rural areas that often have just one insurer with another choice of insurance. It could also result, proponents said, with moderating the rates charged by private insurance carriers.

According to the bill’s sponsors, the public option will change hospital reimbursement formulas to help individual consumers save money on health care while at the same time still allowing hospitals to make a profit Just not as big of a profit as they have been making. They believe that individuals participating in the public option will save 10 percent or more on premiums and more than 15 percent in higher cost areas of the state such as the Western Slope.

One of the stipulations in the final report said that all insurance carriers operating in the state would have to offer a plan on the state’s system, which has some constituencies concerned about the ramifications of that, particularly in rural areas.

The Colorado Association of Health Plans has been actively engaged in the stakeholder process. The trade association for the health insurance industry submitted comments in June and after the draft proposal came out.

"Based on the final report in November, we are opposed. What we don't know is whether the bill reflects that final report or whether it will change from the final report," said Amanda Massey, executive director of the Colorado Association of Health Plans.

"We have significant concerns about the public option, including mandating participation [from insurers] and raising the medical loss ratio. We are also concerned that the public option won't actually lower health-care costs and will increase costs for people with employer-sponsored health insurance," she said.

In the final report, the administration suggested it would cap hospital reimbursements between 175 percent and 225 percent of Medicare-reimbursed rates across the board.

"What we saw with those numbers is that it would actually increase costs because some carriers have contracts that pay below 175 percent of Medicare. It would create a floor and would increase costs for those getting a better deal such as highly competitive areas like Denver and Boulder."

She added that what her organization has heard from hospitals is that "they assume that the formula [for reimbursement] will underpay them on the public option so they are likely to increase costs to those getting insurance through their employers."

The public option's mandate for carriers to participate will be difficult, especially in the 22 areas of the state where there is only one critical access hospital and a small provider pool to choose from.

"How do you reduce their reimbursement and still keep them open?" Massey asked.

The CAHP's other concern is that under the public option, hospitals and carriers are mandated to participate but physicians are not.

"What that means, because of network adequacy laws, they have to have a certain number of providers offering services. This means that doctors know for us to stand up a plan, because we were forced to by the government, it gives them considerable leverage in those negotiations," she said.

The CAHP is also concerned that the actuarial analysis published with the final report didn't dig into how the public option, which is targeted at individuals, would impact the small group, large group or employer-sponsored plan market.

Rep. Roberts said there has been a lot of pushback from hospitals reacting to the proposal released in November.

"What I told everybody is that it is a proposal. It is not the bill. We are using the proposal as a source of ideas but not accepting the proposal as a whole," he said. "We are putting our own legislative spin on it."

Roberts and his co-sponsor, state Sen. Kerry Donovan, a Democrat representing Chaffee, Delta, Eagle, Gunnison, Hinsdale, Lake and Pitkin counties, believe that a public option is necessary because "Colorado hospital profits are the second highest in the nation. They are significantly higher than the median so that's the biggest cost driver for health care," he said.

Hospitals can break even with a 142 percent of Medicare reimbursement rate, so the initial public option proposal has recommended higher reimbursement rates than that, he said.

Roberts believes a lot of the negative response to the public option has been overblown.

"When they actually see the bill, they aren't going to be worse off and may be better off because more people have insurance and more people are coming into their doors," he said.

Many rural areas will see higher reimbursement rates than they are seeing currently. He added that he believes the proposal as it stands is reasonable and financially responsible in trying to solve the state's health-care problems, but "hospitals and insurance companies will fight hard to protect their profits."

The Colorado Hospital Association is opposed to the proposal as it stands.

Chris Tholen, president and CEO of the Colorado Hospital Association, said he has heard from others in the industry that the final public option bill doesn't look like the final report. In an October letter addressed to the Department of Health Care Policy & Financing and the Division of Insurance, Tholen said that the proposal "misses the mark because it prioritizes lower premiums at the expense of patient access and choice."

It also doesn't prioritize coverage and affordability for Colorado's 375,000 uninsured people, doesn't protect patient choice by "undermining competition among insurers and health-care providers" and "fails to defend access to care by cutting hospital payments up to 40 percent."

The CHA believes it has an alternative solution to Colorado's health-care woes. It believes the Total Cost of Care plan in place in Massachusetts, Delaware, Rhode Island and Oregon is the best solution for the state.

"That plan is built on a shared goal, a goal of reducing health-care costs for everyone. It crosses all payers and providers and would benefit all Coloradans," he said.

"It creates a target, a health-care spending target for providers and insurance, an agreed upon target everyone believes in because all had a voice in what that target is," Tholen said.

The Total Cost of Care program would welcome collaboration from all stakeholders; examine total health-care expenditures across the system, their rates of increase over time and the factors driving costs; examine the impact of existing initiatives and continue what's working to improve affordability; and establish an agreed-upon, sustainable rate of growth that is tied to the Colorado economy, according to the CHA.

"We agree that health care is too expensive, and no one can dispute that there is a unifying sentiment across Colorado that real solutions are needed to make care more affordable, accessible and transparent. That said, we see the proposed public option from a different perspective," said Peter Banko, president and CEO of Centura Health, which has hospitals in Longmont and Louisville in the Boulder Valley. "We believe a sustainable solution is attainable, and there are four elements that we would like to see in any bill that moves forward — state-initiated 'fixes' to the current exchange, off-exchange only for expanded coverage, consumer savings protections (or premium reduction targets) and narrow exclusive health plan/provider networks."

Dan Weaver, a spokesman for UCHHealth, said that his organization "does have concerns about the public option final proposal presented by HCPF and DOI late last year, and we shared these concerns in a letter to the administration. However, an actual bill to create the public option has not been introduced during this legislative session, so many of the details are still unknown. Until hospitals see the bill and exactly how the public option might impact employers, patients and hospitals in our state, we really can't discuss the plan itself."

He added that UCHHealth does support the Total Cost of Care program being promoted by the Colorado Hospital Association.

Hospitals across the country tout their placement on various hospital rankings, but with so many different rankings to choose from, how can consumers decide which ones to trust?

Most ratings systems post their methodologies online. Many get their information from publicly available sources, such as the Centers for Medicare & Medicaid Services, the American Hospital Association annual survey and statewide data, although not every state makes this data publicly available. Others send out their own questionnaires and their results are based on those who respond to the survey.

CMS Compare, Healthgrades, The Leapfrog Group and others put out rankings on everything from the best nursing homes and the best cardiac hospitals to the best hospitals overall.

Banner Health, which operates hospitals in Loveland, Greeley and Fort Collins in Northern Colorado, believes that hospital rating systems are a great way for health-care consumers to get a general overview of the quality and safety of a hospital, but if they have specific health-care needs they should “work with their own physician to decide which service and which location is best suited to meet those specific health-care needs,” said Dr. Marjorie Bessel, chief clinical officer for Banner Health.

The Leapfrog Group is a nonprofit organization founded in 2000 by large employers, including General Motors, General Electric, Boeing and Marriott, which “recognized they were spending millions of dollars to provide health-care benefits to employees but didn’t have a sense of the care they were getting,” said Erica Mobley, vice president of administration for The Leapfrog Group.

They wanted to come up with a way to better evaluate hospitals on safety and quality so they could steer their employees to the best hospitals, which, in turn, would result in healthier employees, she said.

The group launched its own volunteer survey asking hospitals about their safety and quality practices. It reports this information in a searchable database on its website. Consumers can look up how hospitals in their area handle maternity care, how many c-sections they perform, infection rates and how safe hospitals are for high-risk surgeries.

Another rating, the Hospital Safety Grade, looks at how well hospitals protect patients from harm or hospital error by looking at the number of infections, blood clots, air embolisms or foreign objects left in a patient after surgery, and gives them a letter grade from A to F. In 2019, 2,100 hospitals took the Leapfrog survey, which accounted for about 70 percent of all the hospital beds in the country. It had 28 data points.

“It’s a pretty good representation but not all hospitals. We’ve been increasing every year. We continue to put the focus on getting more hospitals to participate every year,” she said.

She added that “we invite all general acute care and freestanding hospitals to participate in our survey. Any hospital that wishes to participate can participate although not all metrics are applicable to all facilities.”

Leapfrog bases its hospital ratings on what is reported to it but also uses Medicare data and other data sources to verify information or to report information about hospitals that declined to participate in the Leapfrog survey.

“We go to extreme lengths to verify the accuracy of that information. It is critical we are reporting accurate information on hospitals,” Mobley said. It is an online survey and logic is built into the survey tool to detect for potential errors. The Leapfrog team reviews all survey responses and looks for reporting errors and does do random documentation requests to follow up. Occasionally it will send a member of its team to a small number of facilities to verify their responses to the survey, Mobley said.

UCHealth and other hospital groups that choose not to participate in the Leapfrog survey say they get lower overall rankings because of it. They also complain that the information collected on hospitals that don’t fill out the survey is outdated and, sometimes, inaccurate.

Banner Health and Centura say they like Leapfrog and the CMS ratings because they do a good job of representing the quality and safety of their hospitals.

"We absolutely believe in the importance of transparency. Banner Health will always do our absolute best to accurately represent the data being requested. I would, however, say that a single score rating doesn't represent to consumers their unique needs," Bessel said.

If a consumer has a specific need, such as oncology services, neither of those ratings systems delves deep enough to answer those questions.

"An individual looking at one of those scores may not get the information necessary that they are more likely to get in a conversation with their physician and their oncologist," Bessel said.

Centura Health said it participates in the Leapfrog Hospital Safety Grade survey and the CMS Star Ratings.

"Both of these external ratings, when balanced together, allow us to transparently demonstrate our quality by publishing the results of our efforts," the company said in a written response.

Centura said the advantages of Leapfrog are its established, peer-reviewed algorithm for success and reporting and that it makes it easy for consumers to digest the public reports and compare quality across organizations. Its reporting window is shorter so "our improvement efforts are more relevant than with other evaluation surveys. Grades are not only given for quality outcomes but for an organization's ability to implement safety practices into the care they deliver."

The company added that Leapfrog also allows patients to dive into specific surgeries and services to compare quality across hospitals.

The CMS Star Rating focuses solely on outcomes and allows hospitals to identify strategies to drive improvement, according to Centura Health. The rating, which is based on a bell-shaped curve, uses a risk-adjusted methodology that takes sickness and expected outcomes into account. It also uses a more comprehensive spectrum of patient outcomes, including readmission rates, mortality rate, timeliness of care and effective use of medical imaging.

CMS also includes patient responses to their care.

ISTOCK PHOTO

It "allows patients to dive into more detail and make informed decisions about where they would prefer to receive care," the hospital system said.

Healthgrades is another hospital ranking system that has been around for more than a decade.

"Our mission really has not changed dramatically from a quality point of view in 10 years," said Anthony Del Vicario, senior vice president and general manager for the quality solutions business at Healthgrades. "It is about helping patients make more informed and educated health decisions by providing them with trusted actionable things about outcomes."

Healthgrades looks specifically at clinical outcomes and mortality.

"The reason is we believe that addresses the most important questions a patient or consumer is thinking about. Am I going to survive my hospitalization?" he said.

Healthgrades gets its information from the CMS Medicare dataset, which it then runs through its own methodology. The dataset includes 45 million patient discharge records over a three-year period.

"It is an extremely robust dataset and allows us to rate 4,500 hospitals across the country," he said. "Most importantly, we don't allow the hospitals to opt in or opt out. By using that dataset we're essentially saying, if you are treating a Medicare patient, we will see that data."

Healthgrades looks at 32 specific procedures and conditions across several clinical areas, including cardiology, orthopedics and neuroscience.

The company looks at a hospital's performance and compares actual outcomes to expected outcomes. For instance, an older female patient who smokes and has other health issues may more likely experience a negative outcome than an older female patient who is healthy and never smoked.

Healthgrades recognizes America's 50 best hospitals, the 100 best and the 250 best hospitals in the nation. To score in the best 50, hospitals must achieve that level of perfection for seven years in a row. To be in the top 100, hospitals must have been there for five years or more.

"The reason we look at clinical outcomes and provide ratings is there's such a significant variance in performance, not only as seen across the nation but even within a state," Del Vicario said.

He added that if all hospitals performed at the 5-star level, more than 22,000 lives could have been saved and 149,000 patients could have potentially avoided complications.

Health-care workers are in short supply, as are the people needed to train the next generation of workers.

Many factors fuel shortage of health-care workers

Vacant positions remain unfilled due to cost of living, housing shortages, more

BY DALLAS HELTZELL

news@bizwest.com

Two women dressed in hospital scrubs were riding a bus recently as it passed the site of yet another new medical center rising in booming Northern Colorado. One of the women turned to the other, shook her head and muttered, “Yeah, right. Where are they going to get the nurses?”

In an era of near-full employment and a nationwide nursing shortage, it’s hard enough for health-care facilities to recruit, hire and retain non-physician medical staff. Throw in the facility’s location in an area where the cost of living is high, however, and finding workers becomes that much harder.

“It’s unfortunate,” said Hans Wiik, interim chief executive at Mental Health Partners, which has clinics in Boulder, Broomfield, Lafayette and Longmont. Wiik told a BizWest health-care roundtable last fall that the cost of living in Boulder is rapidly approaching that of Aspen, where he formerly worked, and staff are being forced to move further from their workplaces — or out of the region completely.

“We’re now getting very close that the people who make this community work cannot afford to live here, and we’ve got to figure that out,” he said, “because I’m getting more and more vacant positions, and they'd love to come work for us, they love the mission, they want to do that and help people, and they say, 'I can't afford to live here.'"

Please see Workers, page 12

"Ultimately, it is one of the challenges in this particular market," agreed Theresa McKay, senior director of talent acquisition and recruitment operations for Banner Health. "That's where we have the highest turnover as well — among non-provider roles, individuals who are traveling from neighboring cities and communities into our locations such as Fort Collins, where it is a higher cost of living. Many of our staff will travel from Greeley or Loveland to get closer to work in the Fort Collins area."

Banner currently has no extra inducements in place, McKay said, but "we just have regular market reviews of compensation in general."

Shortages are most acute among what McKay described as "front-line staff, many in our culinary and environmental-service areas. And nursing is a continual shortage."

That shortage is compounded by the fact that 35 percent of the state's licensed registered nurses are 55 or older, according to data from the Center for Nursing Excellence, which notes that the job's physical demands make continuing in the same roles harder for nurses as they age. The aging population of baby boomers also means a greater need for care and an increase in the number of chronic diseases. A survey by Nurse Abnormalities found that 74 percent of nurses would rather have better nurse-to-patient ratios than more pay, and the American Nurses Association estimates that about 500,000 registered nurses a year will retire by 2022.

Finding workers also is hard given the state's low jobless rate. Colorado's seasonally adjusted unemployment rate fell to a record low 2.5 percent in December.

Clouding the future further are questions about the impact on health-care employment if a plan is enacted to provide a public health-insurance option in Colorado, which would let state officials limit what hospitals could charge to people who have coverage under that option. The proposal, which would require hospitals in Colorado to accept the insurance, already has spurred the health-care industry to buy a flood of local television advertising in opposition to the public option and rate setting.

Pressure for rate setting has been fueled by a report the state Department of Health Care Policy and Financing helped produce that showed that Colorado has hospital prices that outpace the rest of the country, the second-highest hospital profits, the fourth-highest hospital administrative expenses and the second-highest rate of hospital construction — despite the state consistently ranking among the country's healthiest.

The Colorado Commission on Higher Education's 2017 Talent Pipeline report illustrated an imbalanced picture of supply and demand for nurses: an average of 2,912 annual openings but only 2,558 nursing degrees granted in 2016. By 2025, according to the federal Department of Health and Human Services, Colorado's demand could exceed supply by 12,900 positions. It estimates that by 2030, the country will have more than a million nursing job openings — and only about 439,000 new nurses to fill those positions.

Those degree programs, moreover, are plagued by a shortage of nursing teachers.

"There's not the amount of educators to support the need for individuals wanting to enter nursing programs," McKay said. "With the opportunities within that base, it's probably more lucrative for a nursing educator to work in the patient-care space vs. education because of the wages."

President Donald Trump's budget proposal for fiscal year 2021, released Feb. 10, would eliminate several nursing programs under HHS and the Department of Education, including most Title VIII Nursing Workforce Development Programs except for the Nurse Corps program.

Banner Health does what it can to mitigate the problem through "partnerships and affiliations with different nursing programs," McKay said. "We have grant scholarships, tuition reimbursement, and opportunities for individuals to be able to have the funding to obtain their registered-nursing degrees. We provide educational resources for students to complete clinical rotations within our organizations as well."

UCHealth, which runs hospitals in Broomfield, Fort Collins, Greeley, Longmont and Loveland, also works with colleges and universities to bring students in for onsite training and to observe clinical rounds.

Centura Health's Longmont United Hospital has reached even farther to tempt workers into the health-care field. Last June, the hospital launched the LUH Adventure University for New Careers in Healthcare (LAUNCH), which put 12 high school juniors and seniors through a week of classes, panel discussions and simulations that offered them a taste of the life of a medical professional. Their experiences ranged from learning how to properly perform cardiopulmonary resuscitation, administer intravenous tubes and apply tourniquets to practicing higher-level skills such as reading electrocardiograms to diagnose heart disease to performing appendectomies and delivering babies with the use of high-tech mannequins.

McKay said Banner's Northern Colorado health-care facilities have from 3.9 percent to 4.2 percent vacancy rates. North Colorado Medical Center in Greeley averages 34 days to fill a job opening, with McKee Medical Center in Loveland at 31 days and its newer Fort Collins medical center at 38 days.

That vacancy rate "fluctuates based on the season," McKay said. "It will go up as the summer months approach because of tourism and acuity — more patients to treat and the same amount of staff to care for them."
