Older unemployed workers face challenges

BY KEN AMUNDSON

kamundson@bizwest.com

Each Monday morning except on holidays and when weather doesn't permit, a group of unemployed Northern Coloradans meets at Faith Church on South Shields in Fort Collins. It's called NoCoNet or Northern Colorado Networking Group.

A similar group, LongsPeakNetworking Organization or LongsPeakNet, meets on Tuesday mornings at Lifebridge Church in Longmont. A third group, BoulderNet, meets on the first and third Thursdays at Mountain View United Methodist Church in Boulder.

The groups all operate similarly. Indeed, their origins came from Hewlett Packard engineers laid off when HP began its downsizing many years ago. The organizational and structural regimens common to engineers have survived.

Members — still numbering in the hundreds for each chapter although attendance may number closer to 50 each week — gather for networking, followed by a formal meeting that includes announcements about job leads and perhaps a presentation by a human resources professional about resume writing or using LinkedIn to find jobs. Often, recruiters set up shop in adjacent classrooms to perform speed interviews with candidates.

"We are a group of experienced, educated and/or credentialed professionals with diverse backgrounds and skills, who are reigniting our careers in a self-reliant manner," the NoCoNet website says.

And like it's beginnings with professional engineers, the membership of the groups tends to be professional people, although no longer just engineers. Health-care workers, journalists, scientists, managerial experts, professors, engineers — almost everyone with a college degree and often an advanced degree — populate the rooms.

And almost everyone, but not all, have gray hair.

These are experienced professionals who have worked, in most cases, for a couple of decades in their careers and are now seeking their next opportunity.

They fit almost perfectly the description of today's American jobless as described in widely cited studies. Most often cited recently is a report published Dec. 28 in ProPublica based on research by ProPublica and the Urban Institute, using the gold standard of data compiled by the National Institutes of Health and the Social Security Administration.

The title: If You're Over 50, Chances Are the Decision to Leave a Job Won't be Yours. Here's a link to the report: <https://www.propublica.org/article/older-workers-united-states-pushed-out-of-work-forced-retirement>

The lengthy report chock full of details can be summed up in two paragraphs.

“Through 2016, our analysis found that between the time older workers enter the study and when they leave paid employment, 56 percent are laid off at least once or leave jobs under such financially damaging circumstances that it’s likely they were pushed out rather than choosing to go voluntarily. “Only one in 10 of these workers ever again earns as much as they did before their employment setbacks, our analysis showed. Even years afterward, the household incomes of over half of those who experience such work disruptions remain substantially below those of workers who don’t.”

Put another way, 40 million Americans over age 50 are working, 22 million of them will suffer a layoff and only two million will recover.

NoCoNet member Alan, with his doctorate in physics and experience in nuclear energy, has been looking for work in the electrical utility industry. While jobs for nuclear physicists are few and far between in Northern Colorado, Alan’s experience gives him useful insights into integrating new green power sources such as wind and solar into traditional energy grids. He’s been able to find contract work but no full time job with benefits.

Jillian, a communications professional, has struggled to find work in her field, especially work at a pay level that might be appropriate for her experience. “There’s a huge pay gap,” she said. “Everyone [employers] wants a master’s degree but wants to pay $40,000.”

Tyler, one of the younger members of NoCoNet in his 30s, has international studies expertise. He recently returned from South Korea where he taught. He feels “caught in the gig economy,” a reference to very part time and contract jobs.

Nancy is a nurse practitioner — a highly sought-after commodity in the health-care industry — complained about how difficult it is to find real people to talk with about jobs. “You don’t know who you’re applying to,” she said. Modern digital screening systems eliminate any human contact until late in the application process, as most of today’s applicants know. Speakers at the networking meetings sometimes give tips about how to beat the algorithms of the digital screeners.

Marcia, a civil engineer who took a break from her profession to take care of a dying parent, said employers perceive, because of her age, that she will demand higher pay than they’re willing to pay, even though she knows she may have to start over in her profession.

And Ed, a mostly retired executive, could be lured out of it with the right opportunity but noted that “competition is intense at the upper levels” where many of the professionals in the room would like to return.

“If people wanted to work, they could find a job,” some in industry say, given the low unemployment numbers and, if it continues until June, an economy that will be tied for the longest stretch of expansion in U.S. history.

But the experiences of those at the networking groups run contrary to the conventional wisdom, suggesting that employment in Northern Colorado — or the nation as a whole — can be uneven.

Adam Crowe, business development manager for the Larimer County Economic and Workforce Development office, said the workforce office tends to see more older workers than younger, “but older people tend to know how to reach out and where to go for assistance,” he said.

OLDER WORKERS FROM 5

that might run contrary to the trend experienced by the NoCoNet group, he cited health-care employers, especially senior living companies, and Larimer County itself.

Christine Kuehnast, employee relations manager for Larimer County, said human resources managers at the county work to train hiring managers to ignore stereotypes such as how older workers may have fewer current skills.

“We’re dedicated to hiring older workers and marginalized groups such as veterans and the disabled,” she said. “Older workers have experience and knowledge that younger workers do not have. They’re reliable. They’re dedicated. They come to work every day no matter what.”

She said the county values perspectives that can be gained only by a lifetime of experience or by work within multiple careers.

Employers often agree that older workers have the soft skills — the ability to get along with other workers, to show up on time for work, and to follow procedures. But what about the hard skills — up-to-date computer skills, programming, digital techniques to streamline how products are made.

“Older workers have learned how to navigate the workplace,” she said. “There aren’t a whole of positions that are unsuitable for older workers or for which older workers can’t be trained,” she said.

But what about people like Alan, the nuclear physicist? “We try to look first at a person’s qualifications and not their last job title,” she said.

Joyce Saffel, human resources director at Columbine Health Systems, which has nursing homes, assisted living facilities and rehabilitation facilities in multiple Northern Colorado cities, said the population of Columbine residents tends to attract older workers, many times people who have had the experience of placing their own parents in assisted living environments.

Columbine hires two sorts of people — clinical employees like nurses who need to have licenses or certificates in order to perform their duties, and non-clinical such as drivers or facility maintenance people.

“We look for people who enjoy being around older people, and we’ve found that older workers are reliable and willing to step up to help when help is needed,” she said. Often, workers age with the operation. “If you have a good culture, you can age with a company.”

In her experience, she often finds that applicants need help to improve their hard skills. “It does take more time to train them sometimes, but with a little effort you can get a better employee. When they get it [the skill], they get it for good.”

Columbine’s approach is sometimes to have applicants shadow an existing employee to discover whether the job is something they want to do. Some jobs have physical requirements, such as lifting, and the company may test to see that an applicant can perform. “We want to keep people in their jobs as long as possible,” she said.

And that’s exactly what most older workers also want. Given the ProPublica report about future earning potential of laid-off older workers, working longer may replace the retirement they once dreamed about.

All of Us program gathers data for precision medicine

BY KEN AMUNDSON
kamundson@bizwest.com

GREELEY — Modern medicine has created miraculous cures for diseases and conditions that at one time baffled doctors. Yet the magic bullet that saves one patient or one group of patients doesn't necessarily work on all.

And researchers — or families — are left to wonder why.

In recent years, medical scientists have adopted the term “precision medicine,” meaning medicine that is tuned to be the most effective with the specific, individual patient. Figuring out how to apply precision medicine, short of trial and error, is the goal of a new program just launched in Colorado at North Colorado Medical Center in Greeley.

All of Us research program, headed in Colorado by regional medical director Dr. Michael Bradfield, a family physician at NCMC, will contribute to a national program to gather real patient data in hopes of finding the next great cure for major diseases.

Partners in the program include hospital systems like Banner Health, universities, regional medical centers, federal agencies such as the National Institutes of Health, and health-care foundations. Together, they will recruit 1 million people who agree to share their health histories with the program so that researchers can tap the data to spot trends and outcomes among similar genetic groups.

“It's not a study but a resource,” said Bradfield. “It will be a catalyst for studies.”

“This will strive to develop ways to measure risks for a range of diseases based on environmental exposures, genetic factors, regional health practices and the interplay between these factors... Our hope is that in the coming years we will have access to a wide range of study results that will help them live healthier lives through better disease prevention and treatment,” he said.

Funded for 10 years by the NIH, precision medicine is seen as one of two primary health-care emphases, Bradfield said. The other emphasis is the opioid crisis.

Precision medicine treats patients based on lifestyle, gender and other characteristics of individuals. “Some people's genetics predispose them for certain treatments,” he said. Figuring out what works most effectively is the long term aim of All of Us.

Bradfield's four-person team at NCMC has just begun the program in Colorado. As of late May, 159 people had signed up to participate. In Banner overall, 27,000 have enrolled so far. Banner's Arizona operations began participation two years ago.

Kim Arnett, research assistant, said people who sign up will first sign consent forms including one that gives permission for the program to access health histories. They'll be asked to complete three surveys or questionnaires. Then, they'll be examined by a health-care professional to gather baseline data — blood pressure, blood and urine testing results, and more — to be entered into the databank. The program hopes to establish relationships with participants that extend for many years, perhaps for the remainder of the participants' lives.

“We want the database to represent the diversity of the United States,” Bradfield said. While the program is not targeting any specific populations, it does want populations under-represented in the past to be part of it — rural residents, for example, or those earning lower incomes.

Participants need to be 18 years old or older, with pediatric participants to be added later. Participants need to be able to give consent and not be incarcerated.

So far, those most interested seem to be people who have an interest in health care or people who have been frustrated with their care or the care of family members, Bradfield said.

“This is the largest thing since the Framingham study,” Bradfield said, referring to the cardiovascular disease study that began in 1948 in Framingham, Mass., which continues today.

Michael Risse, clinical research coordinator for All of Us at NCMC, said he became part of the program because he wants to be part of something that reduces trial and error in medicine.

Research assistant Daniel Marin said family health history drove him to join the effort.

Bradfield said the program is working with partners such as the University of Northern Colorado, Sunrise Community Health clinics, North Colorado Family Medicine and the Weld County Health Department to get the word out and to share survey data when possible.

Fort Collins VA clinic comes out of the shadows

BY DAN ENGLAND

news@bizwest.com

FORT COLLINS — When veterans walk into the Veterans Administration clinic in Fort Collins or Loveland, they might just want to see their doctor. What they get is an army.

There's a team assigned to every veteran, and that team includes a pharmacist, a social worker and a mental health provider. They're all there to assess the vet's overall health, not just diagnose disease.

The system started a couple of years ago, when all that specialized care was integrated into primary care. The VA did it in part to match health-care networks' advancement, but it also was an acknowledgment that mental health is a big piece of a person's overall health.

Mental health may be coming into its own after decades of living in the shadows. We now live in an era where Cigna's latest marketing campaign stars actors such as Ted Danson with the message "your physical and emotional

DAN ENGLAND / FOR BIZWEST

Dr. Kristin Tempco looks in the ears of Stephen Ferguson, 72, of Fort Collins at the VA clinic in Fort Collins. Ferguson served in Vietnam and is a good example of the way the VA treats both physical and mental health, as he recently had a case of late-onset PTSD that the clinic helped him work through.

health are more connected than you think.” But it’s a welcome change that in some ways the VA needed to lead, said Sam House, the public affairs officer for the Cheyenne VA Health Care System. Twenty veterans kill themselves every day, and 14 never step foot in a VA clinic.

“There are individuals who need help, for one reason or another, and they’ve never reached out to the VA,” House said. “It’s irritating. Our number-one priority is suicide prevention.”

The Fort Collins clinic plays a role in that. There veterans find many of the same services people expect to find in a physician’s office, but there are also services that specialize in veteran care. These include police officers who know how to talk down an angry vet because they were veterans themselves, and social workers who can help homeless veterans, in addition to mental health professionals who understand PTSD and other common ailments veterans face.

“The advantage of the VA is every single one of our providers are focused only on veterans,” House said. “That’s all we treat. So our providers are able to understand, say, a hearing loss a vet may have that someone in the private sector may not quite understand.”

Although the awareness is increasing,

“That is one of my biggest frustrations as a vet myself. It’s not with the VA system. It’s with the Department of Defense.”

Sam House, public affairs officer
Cheyenne VA Health Care System

and veterans are more comfortable talking about their mental health, they still face obstacles that civilians may not understand. House said soldiers are trained to suck it up, not to get in touch with their feelings.

“You learn in basic training that if you (seek help) for your mental health, your career is over,” said House, who spent a good part of his career with the U.S. Army in public affairs. “Maybe that’s not as true these days. But that is what is ingrained in them. They should not talk about it. They just need to get over it.”

The issue, House said, is not combat. The issue is coming home. Soldiers don’t get the kind of training they need to integrate themselves back into society, House said.

“They generally aren’t ready for a lot of stuff,” he said. “That is one of my biggest frustrations as a vet myself. It’s not with the VA system. It’s with the Department of Defense.”

The system generates a lot of demand from veterans, including close to a dozen who stop in daily without appointments. Fort Collins, the largest city in Northern Colorado, is feeling the crunch. The clinic is smaller than most, with nearly 10,000 square feet of space. That will change in a couple of years, when the VA clinic will move to a brand new, 90,000-square-foot building more fitting for a city the size of Fort Collins.

The VA continues to evolve, with telemedicine and whole health offerings such as acupuncture, essential oils and other alternative medicine, in addition to more traditional care such as cancer treatments, and it will continue to expand its mental health treatments.

That helped Stephen Ferguson, 72, of Fort Collins, who served in Vietnam with the U.S. Army. He was recently diagnosed with PTSD after reconnecting with some Vietnam vets and discussing the war. They call it “late onset” PTSD, Ferguson said.

“I didn’t think I was real bad,” he said. “But I did get better.”

JOEL BLOCKER / FOR BIZWEST

Wil Huett, past president of the Rocky Mountain Flycasters, a Northern Colorado chapter of Trout Unlimited, casts his fly rod during an afternoon of fishing at Riverbend Ponds Natural Area in Fort Collins recently.

More than fish get hooked on a fly line

BY DAN ENGLAND

news@bizwest.com

At age 75, after more than 50 years of fly fishing, Wil Huett hopes to learn how to tie his own flies.

His son, Matt, was so good at tying flies, he was asked to do it for professionals. But Matt married into a golfing family, and so he hung up his rod and passed along his equipment to his father.

Huett is a past president in charge of community outreach for Rocky Mountain Flycasters, a Larimer County chapter of Trout Unlimited. He also, of course, fishes as much as he can and has for decades.

So after the expensive fly-tying equipment sat in his garage awhile, Huett felt bad about that, given his experience and his position with the Flycasters. He finally decided to put that equipment to use.

“He gave me a few lessons,” Huett said and laughed. “I’m doing my best.”

Huett’s situation demonstrates how fly fishing can be a sport as recreational or as obsessive as you want to make it. You can spend thousands, but you can start the sport with a $100 rod. You can cast for trout in fast mountain streams (especially this year), or you can cast for carp at your local park lake. You can wade or fish on the banks. You can use someone else’s ties, or you can make your own, and in fact, some anglers prefer to do little but tie their own flies as intricately as an artist using a dash of watercolor. And even if you’re a long-time veteran, there’s always something to learn.

“It’s OK to jump right into fly fishing,” said Howard Horton, the angler outreach coordinator for Colorado Parks and Wildlife. “It can be as complicated and as simple as you want it.”

Let’s use Monic Flylines in Boulder as an example. The owner, Bob Goodale, designs fly lines that are clear so they don’t spook fish, made for specific species and water and are environmentally friendly. He sells to retail companies such as LL Bean and Bass Pro Shops as well as on his own website. But he also said you don’t need all that if you want to start fly fishing or enjoy it around Colorado. A general fly line good for fishing trout would be enough.

“You can start out fishing for trout, and then eventually, you might say, ‘Gee, I’d like to go bone fishing,’” Goodale said. “Then you might need a bigger rod, or you might want to use some of our clear lines.”

In fact, Goodale sends people to Rocky Mountain Angler in Boulder to get started.

“They’ll set you up and give you everything you need,” Goodale said. “They have classes and what rod and reel to buy and all that. You can spend $1,000 for a rod, but you don’t need that. You can get a rod for $100. That way you can determine if it’s something you really want to do.”

Many times beginners or casual fly anglers prefer to fish in the summer, so they may not need waders, or incorporate fly fishing into other activities.

“You can hike but take your rod with you,” Horton said. “Or maybe they will fish a bit when they go camping.”

One of the best ways to get experience in a hurry is to find some fishing buddies, and a good way to do that is to join a group. Rocky Mountain Flycasters, Huett’s group, is a good place to start. Some are in the organization just for the conservation projects as a part of Trout Unlimited, but most of them fish, Huett said. The group typically meets once a month. There are more than 850 paying members who are Colorado State University students, young professionals — one woman is 27 — and a member who is 89. There are other groups on Facebook.

“We have beginners who walk in the door and say, ‘How do I learn?’” Huett said. “You can tell them what you want to learn, and you’ll find someone who says, ‘OK, let’s go fishing next Thursday.’”

The organization has informal fishing trips where everyone, not just fish whisperers, are welcome, and members love to teach tips such as “match the hatch” (use a lure that looks like the bug hatching right now), how to cast and where to go.

After all, not even Huett knows everything, as he’s in his mid-70s and trying to learn how to tie flies. He began back when he attended college: He borrowed his friend’s fly rod when he was attending college, caught a bass and became, well, hooked. He moved to Colorado in 1971 and has fly fished ever since. He loves to keep the lands in good condition and helping the fish, and he loves being in pretty places.

“The trout live in the most beautiful places” Huett said. “I’ve had deer walk so close up to me that I could have touched them with my rod tip.”

But he loves catching and releasing the fish the most. The other day, he hooked a 27-inch carp. Carp are not good eating, but in that moment, in a little pond in Fort Collins, that was hardly the point.

“He would make a turn, and the line would scrape against a rock, and I thought, many times, that he was going to break me off,” Huett said. “But no, he fought me, and I fought him, and it took me 30 minutes to land him. It was great fun.”

FORT COLLINS — A Northern Colorado firm is bringing the expertise of Wall Street to Main Street.

Fidelity Equity Partners LLC is a Fort Collins-based boutique advisory firm from Izzy Lozada and Chad Davidson. Fidelity's services include helping companies prepare for their future and make the best decisions for their business going forward. The company is currently working with Ascent Solar Technologies Inc. (OTC: ASTI), Thornton, to help Ascent in its plans and efforts to drive shareholder value. Fidelity also works with companies like Black Hound Design Co. and Rare Channels Solutions LLC.

The company started with a fence: Lozada and Davidson were neighbors, and as their families became friends the two realized there was potential to work together. Davidson moved from Las Vegas to Fort Collins in 2012. Prior to moving here, he was working in public accounting. Lozada moved to Northern Colorado after working in New York.

His background was in consulting and capital markets, but he grew tired of Wall Street institutions stacking terms in favor of their investors rather than the companies they were working with.

"You look at the graveyard of startups," he said, "the firms are like oyster suckers looking for a pearl. If they don't find that pearl, they scoop out the meat — everything good about that business — and eat anyway."

The two decided they could bring their business and financial backgrounds together to give high-quality advisory services but with a personal touch.

"I look back on my own parents running their own company," Davidson said. "They didn't get great advice because they didn't have that jazzy appeal. If they had gotten better guidance along the way, they could have been three-, four-, 10-times better and adequately managed their business. They did a great job with what they had. But now I'm trying to find companies that are like my parents out in the world and give them the advice mine never got."

Fidelity, formed in 2017, can help companies with their legacy planning, such as transitioning a family-owned business into who will take it over next. Fidelity also works with pre-revenue companies and startups; they run an incubator and accelerator program for startups all across the country. Fidelity can help companies retool their message for investors, especially as markets can change and evolved.

“We love to Cinderella our opportunities,” Lozada said. “People might poo-poo an idea, but we can see there’s a lot there. A lot of times, companies don’t know how to deliver their message.”

While some might say living on the coasts is a better location to do this type of advisory work, Fidelity said they’re able to help businesses all over the country from Fort Collins. Lozada said being in Northern Colorado helps them.

“The West Coast Bay Area or East Coast Manhattan, Wall Street community: I think people can be very intimidated by those types of cultures,” he said. “We speak to clients all around the country and the world. A lot of folks don’t trust Wall Street people for some reason. We can still access that upper echelon but people working with us don’t feel condescended to.”

In fact, Davidson said without being in a city like Fort Collins, Fidelity Equity’s mission wouldn’t be possible.

“We can’t claim to bring Wall Street to Main Street and still live on Wall Street,” he said.

“A lot of folks don’t trust Wall Street people for some reason. We can still access that upper echelon but people working with us don’t feel condescended to.”

Death, taxes, enlarged prostates

Men can be certain about these

BY KEN AMUNDSON

kamundson@bizwest.com

Death and taxes are not the only things certain in life. Men — at least more than 90 percent of men — can also count on dealing with an enlarged prostate.

Benign prostatic hyperplasia, or BPH, affects most men, although some will not experience symptoms. New treatment methods that don't involve a pill a day for life or invasive surgery are providing hope for those afflicted. One of those less-invasive treatments is called Prostatic Urethral Lift, or Urolift, which is now available in Northern Colorado and the Boulder Valley.

A little anatomy helps to explain what happens with this disorder.

The prostate is a walnut-sized male reproductive organ that sits below the bladder. Its normal size is about 3 by 3 by 5 centimeters and about 25 grams. Its main function is to secrete a fluid that is part of semen; its muscle helps propel the semen during intercourse.

Urine from the bladder flows through the prostate. As the prostate expands as men age, it can and often does restrict the flow of urine, starting in the 40s for some men and increasing into their 60s, 70s and 80s. The Mayo Clinic lists common symptoms as:

- Frequent or urgent need to urinate.
- Increased frequency of urination at night (nocturia).
- Difficulty starting urination.
- Weak urine stream or a stream that stops and starts.
- Dribbling at the end of urination.
- Inability to completely empty the bladder.
- Cancer of the prostate or bladder.

The disorder can also cause bladder infections, damage to the bladder when it tries and fails to force urine into the urethra, and kidney damage.

Common remedies include treatment with drugs such as Flomax, which would need to be continued throughout life; transurethral resection of the prostate, or TURP, in which a doctor scoops out tissue that is blocking urine flow; or the relatively new Urolift system in which tiny clips are carried into the prostate through the urethra and implanted in a way that spreads the urine pathway wider.

The Urolift procedure is growing in popularity, according to Dr. Timothy Soper, a urologist with UCHealth in Fort Collins.

"It is something that has gradually been disseminated into clinical practice, and it has caught on like wildfire," Soper said. The urologist has used the procedure for about 18 months and in that time has performed more than 90.

"Recovery is much quicker, it's much less invasive, and in 99 percent of patients it preserves ejaculation," he said. The other procedures can result in retrograde ejaculation, which means the semen goes into the bladder instead of out through the urethra.

He said the results of Urolift are reported to be about 85 percent success without deterioration over a seven-year period. That is borne out in his patients, too, with about 85 percent reporting improved symptoms.

HOW THE UROLIFT® SYSTEM WORKS

Enlarged prostate:

An enlarged prostate can narrow or even block the urethra, causing bothersome urinary symptoms.

STEP 1

The Urolift® Delivery Device is placed through the obstructed urethra to access the enlarged prostate.

STEP 2

Tiny Urolift Implants are permanently placed to lift and hold the enlarged prostate tissue out of the way and increase the opening of the urethra. The permanent Implants are delivered through a small needle that comes out of the Urolift Delivery Device and into the prostate.

STEP 3

The Urolift System treatment provides fast and reliable symptom relief by opening the obstructed urethra.

A first-person account

I'm among the millions of men who have experienced the effects of an enlarged prostate. In my case, starting in my late 50s, I noticed more-frequent urination, greater urgency, reduced flow and a sense that I was not emptying my bladder.

While these things were somewhat manageable, what really irritated me was the need to get up to urinate once or twice during the night. I don't like interrupted sleep.

KEN AMUNDSON

Dr. Timothy Soper, a urologist with UHealth in Northern Colorado, conducted a seminar during which he explained the options for men like me — and there were several in the room who experienced much-worse symptoms than mine.

I didn't particularly like the idea of treatment with drugs, which are acceptable to many but I like to avoid drug treatment when possible. The more invasive treatments such as TURP, which Dr. Soper described as using a tiny ice cream scoop to remove prostate tissue, also left me more willing to just put up with the symptoms.

The Urolift sounded like more of a middle path and one that I could handle. I decided to explore it.

In a one-on-one consultation, Soper reviewed the options again and did a preliminary exam. To continue, I needed to schedule a visit at which he performed an in-office cystoscopy, in which the doctor placed a scope into the urethra and all the way into the bladder to make sure that my issue was an enlarged prostate and not a tumor or blockage of some other kind. I found this procedure to be very painful, even with a local anesthetic.

He also examined the prostate in the more common method that most men my age have experienced. He found my prostate to be 55 grams in size instead of the normal 25 or 30.

The Urolift procedure itself, which takes about 30 minutes, can be performed in a doctor's office, but Soper has found that most of his patients are more comfortable in a surgical center. An anesthesiologist put me to sleep, similar to what happens during a colonoscopy.

Four, tiny, stainless-steel implants were carried through the urethra and clipped into the prostate to spread the urine passageway. Some men need only two, and others might need six.

When I awoke a few minutes later, I was placed in a recovery room and instructed to urinate. Soper had told me that I couldn't leave until that occurred, and if I was unable to urinate, then a catheter would need to be installed for a day or two. Given my pain reaction to cystoscopy, he expected that I would need the catheter.

Fortunately, I didn't need the catheter and was able to perform as instructed. Then I was driven home.

For the next 24 hours, I had great urgency every waking minute and not a lot of control. I was awake until my normal bedtime, but I did sleep fairly soundly after that — 40 minutes to an hour at a time, punctuated by the need to visit the restroom with great urgency. Day two was better, night two was interrupted by only one visit to the restroom, and day three was starting to resemble more normal life.

I experienced blood in the urine early in the recovery process and some burning continued into day 3, when this report was being written.

The procedure is covered by insurance and, in my case, by Medicare.

UROLIFT FROM 14

"It's a kinder, gentler approach and it seems to be a more-durable therapy," Soper said. At age 55, he recognizes that he might also be a candidate for it in the future. "I want to teach one of my partners so they can do me at some point," he said.

Dr. John Kefer, who practices with Colorado Urology in Lafayette, said his experience with the Urolift has been similar; he's performed about 200.

"It benefits men who want to stop taking medication every day and don't want to go into the operating room. Recovery time is within a couple of weeks, and the real benefits continue to present themselves for weeks after," Kefer said.

He said "the bladder is unhappy" in men who have suffered with an enlarged prostate for long periods. The bladder wall gets thicker as it works to expel urine.

"I tell patients that the bladder becomes like a weight lifter when what you want is a bladder like a yoga instructor — thin and lithe."

Success of the procedure can be measured in different ways, both Kefer and Soper said, but commonly the International Prostate Symptom Score, an eight-question screening tool, is used to determine whether Urolift had results. A 10-point decline in the score at two weeks is considered a success, and then continued decline over time.

"I had a patient yesterday who went from a 33 to a six," Kefer said.

Another doctor who performs the procedure, Dr. Charles Anderson with Colorado Urology at Louisville, said, "A boatload of patients on Flomax will experience years of pills that they don't have to take. A five minute procedure can alleviate symptoms," he said.

Anderson has performed it for about four years. He said in his experience patients see continual improvement over months. The bladder, for example, continues to improve for a year or longer even after the patient has recovered.

Urolift, a trademarked system offered by NeoTract Inc. of Pleasanton, California, requires physicians to be certified in the system. There are six doctors in Northern Colorado and the Boulder Valley currently certified, and they practice in Fort Collins, Lafayette, Louisville, Boulder, Westminster and Longmont.

WE MENDED A FAILING HEART AND KEPT THEIR ROMANCE ALIVE

When you have that newlywed glow, everything seems rosy. So when Jean Richter started feeling short of breath, she wasn't initially concerned. But then her symptoms worsened and her beloved husband, Dave, had to rush her to the Foothills Hospital Emergency Department.

Jean was diagnosed with heart failure, a chronic condition that has a 50% survival rate within five years of diagnosis if not treated correctly. Luckily for Jean, Boulder Community Health had recently opened the first specialized Heart Failure Clinic in Boulder County. Dr. Scott Blois's expertise with the latest treatment options set Jean on a remarkable journey back to a full active life.

"I have a wonderful husband, five incredible daughters and 13 grandkids I adore," says Jean. "I'm so happy we can hike, travel and have fun together again."

Read Jean's story at bch.org/healinghearts or call 303-442-2395 for information about Boulder County's first Heart Failure Clinic.
