Many factors fuel shortage of health-care workers

By Dallas Heltzell
news@bizwest.com

Two women dressed in hospital scrubs were riding a bus recently as it passed the site of yet another new medical center rising in booming Northern Colorado. One of the riders turned to the other, shook her head and was overheard muttering, “Yeah, right. Where are they going to get the nurses?”

In a pre-pandemic era of near-full employment and a nationwide nursing shortage, it was hard enough for health-care facilities to recruit, hire and retain non-physician medical staff.

Then came the new coronavirus, which presented the potential for soaring patient loads while at the same time preempting businesses of all kinds from holding traditional job fairs because of the need for “social distancing.”

Finally, throw in the location in an area where the cost of living is high, and finding workers becomes harder still.

“It’s unfortunate,” said Hans Wiik, interim chief executive at Mental Health Partners, which has clinics in Boulder, Broomfield, Lafayette and Longmont. Wiik told a BizWest health-care roundtable last fall that the cost of living in the region is rapidly approaching that of Aspen, where he formerly worked, and staff are being forced to move further from their workplaces — or out of the region completely.

“We’re now getting very close that the people who make this community work cannot afford to live here, and we’ve got to figure that out,” he said, “because I’m getting more and more vacant positions, and they’d love to come work for us, they love the mission, they want to do that and help people, and they say, ‘I can’t afford to live here.’”

Although Boulder Community Health doesn’t offer housing subsidies, said Patricia Harris, its associate vice president for human resources, it has “been really aggressive in having a competitive pay program, and for some of our entry-level positions we’re actually even offering sign-on bonuses. We also provide a very comprehensive benefits package that includes a free RTD pass. They get an EcoPass just by being a member of our organization and that will assist them in their commute.”

“Ultimately, it is one of the challenges in this particular market,” agreed Theresa McKay, senior director of talent acquisition and recruitment operations for Banner Health, with hospitals in Greeley, Fort Collins and Loveland. “That’s where we have the highest turnover as well — among non-provider roles, individuals who are traveling from neighboring cities and communities into our locations such as Fort Collins, where it is a higher cost of living. Many of our staff will travel from Greeley or Loveland to get closer to work in the Fort Collins area.”

As with Boulder Community Health, Banner currently has no extra inducements in place, McKay said, but “we just have regular market reviews of compensation in general.”

Shortages are most acute among what McKay described as “front-line staff, many in our culinary and environmental-service areas. And nursing is a continual shortage.”

That shortage is compounded by the fact that 35% of the state’s licensed registered nurses are 55 or older, according to data from the Center for Nursing Excellence, which notes that the job’s physical demands make continuing in the same roles harder for nurses as they age. The aging population of baby boomers also means a greater need for care and an increase in the number of chronic diseases. A survey by Nurse Abnormalities found that 74% of nurses would rather have better nurse-to-patient ratios than more pay, and the American Nurses Association estimates that about 500,000 registered nurses a year will retire by 2022.

Finding workers also was hard given the low jobless rate the state had before the arrival of the COVID-19 crisis. Colorado’s seasonally adjusted unemployment rate fell to a record low 2.5% in December.

Clouding the future further are questions about the impact on health-care employment if a plan is enacted to provide a public health-insurance option in Colorado, which would let state officials limit what hospitals could charge to people who have coverage under that option. The proposal, which would require hospitals in Colorado to accept the insurance, has spurred the health-care industry to buy a flood of local television advertising in opposition to the public option and rate setting. As of the close of the 2020 legislative session, the plan had not been enacted, but will likely rise again in 2021.

Pressure for rate setting has been fueled by a report the state Department of Health Care Policy and Financing helped produce that showed that Colorado has hospital prices that outpace the rest of the country, the second-highest hospital profits, the fourth-highest hospital administrative expenses and the second-highest rate of hospital construction — despite the state consistently ranking among the country’s healthiest.

The Colorado Commission on Higher Education’s 2017 Talent Pipeline report illustrated an imbalanced picture of supply and demand for nurses: an average of 2,912 annual openings but only 2,558 nursing degrees granted in 2016. By 2025, according to the federal Department of Health and Human Services, Colorado’s demand could exceed supply by 12,900 positions. It estimates that by 2030, the country will have more than a million nursing job openings — and only about 439,000 new nurses to fill those positions.

Those degree programs, moreover, are plagued by a shortage of nursing teachers.

“There’s not the amount of educators to support the need for individuals wanting to enter nursing programs,” McKay said. “With the opportunities within that base, it’s probably more lucrative for a nursing educator to work in the patient-care space vs. education because of the wages.”

President Donald Trump’s budget proposal for fiscal year 2021, released Feb. 10, would eliminate several nursing programs under HHS and the Department of Education, including most Title VIII Nursing Workforce Development Programs except for the Nurse Corps program.

Banner Health does what it can to mitigate the problem through “partnerships and affiliations with different nursing programs,” McKay said. “We have grant scholarships, tuition reimbursement, and opportunities for individuals to be able to have the funding to obtain their registered-nursing degrees. We provide educational resources for students to complete clinical rotations within our organizations as well.”

Harris said Boulder Community Health stresses the wide variety of tasks it takes to run a hospital or clinic.

“One of the things BCH has done specifically is open up our communications strategy with the local community about what health-care jobs are available,” she said. “A lot of times the community gets stuck that health care is really about being a physician or being a nurse, but there’s such a diversity of opportunities that are available that go beyond those clinic-specific roles. BCH has really been focused on educating the community about the possibilities of what’s available in health care from a career perspective.”

BCH also reaches out to organizations including the Boulder Chamber, Workforce Connection and the Boulder Together consortium of nonprofits, Harris said.

“Not only do we do recruitment for people who have had health-care experience, but we’re also encouraging those who have not to consider health care in their career searches,” she said.

UCHealth, which runs hospitals in Broomfield, Fort Collins, Greeley, Longmont and Loveland, also works with colleges and universities to bring students in for onsite training and to observe clinical rounds.

Centura Health’s Longmont United Hospital has reached even farther to tempt workers into the health-care field. Last June, the hospital launched the LUH Adventure University for New Careers in Healthcare (LAUNCH), which put 12 high school juniors and seniors through a week of classes, panel discussions and simulations that offered them a taste of the life of a medical professional. Their experiences ranged from learning how to properly perform cardiopulmonary resuscitation, administer intravenous tubes and apply tourniquets to practicing higher-level skills such as reading electrocardiograms to diagnose heart disease to performing appendectomies and delivering babies with the use of high-tech mannequins.

Before the coronavirus crisis, McKay said, Banner’s Northern Colorado health-care facilities had from 3.9% to 4.2% vacancy rates. North Colorado Medical Center in Greeley averaged 34 days to fill a job opening, with McKee Medical Center in Loveland at 31 days and its newer Fort Collins medical center at 38 days.

That vacancy rate “fluctuates based on the season,” McKay said. “It will go up as the summer months approach because of tourism and acuity — more patients to treat and the same amount of staff to care for them.”

At dental clinics, the new rules have teeth

COURTESY HEALTH DISTRICT OF NORTHERN LARIMER COUNTY

Dr. Ryan Bond, a dentist, practices in Longmont, has put safety protocols in place in order to operate in a COVID world.

By Dallas Heltzell

news@bizwest.com

Like all other businesses in Northern Colorado and the Boulder Valley, restrictions related to the coronavirus pandemic took a big bite out of dental clinics' revenue. However, when it came to protecting their patients and staff, dentists willingly put their money where your mouth is.

"We have had to turn everything on its head and consider everything, all of our processes," said Laura DePorter, co-founder and business manager at Mountain Ridge Dentistry in Berthoud.

Job 1 was curbing the spread of potentially virus-laden droplets the dentists call "aerosols" that are generated during oral procedures.

"We use a dry shield that hooks up to a central suction that we have," said Ryan Bond, owner of Bond Family Dentistry in Longmont. "It stays right inside the mouth, keeps the patient's mouth open and is constantly pulling all the liquid and aerosols into it, straight through the vacuum system. Anything that escapes that, the air purifier is running enough that it's cycling the air in the room every five minutes. So anything outside that should be captured and taken care of."

At Mountain Ridge, DePorter said a similar system is used on patients.

"They're no longer getting the water spray and using the suction," she said. "Everything having to do with creating aerosols has stopped, and there are no high-speed handpieces. We basically give what's considered an aerosol-free cleaning; we're calling it within our office a 'dry cleaning.' It makes sure there are no aerosols for the team member or the patient."

All the new equipment — air purifiers, N-95 masks, face shields and more — were expensive, and getting them often was challenging. Bond said he spent around $16,000 for the air purifiers and filters alone, "but we knew they were important and tried to get those as soon as we could."

"We had to search the internet for all these new pieces of protective equipment we need to wear," DePorter said. "We spent $4,000 to $5,000 just in the past couple of weeks on all the N-95 masks, gear and equipment we need to just to open back up."

"The state health department has revised its guidelines to where they're a little more reasonable," Bond said. "At first it was saying it was mandatory for things like shoe covers that we just don't have access to. They're not available."

Bond said he had to look for masks outside his normal supply route because the Federal Emergency Management Agency commandeered a portion of them. That makes what masks he could get that much more precious.

"We get these N-95 masks to last longer because we don't touch them without gloves on, we cover them with another mask, and we use face shields."

All those face coverings are hot, uncomfortable and make communicating with patients harder, Bond and DePorter said.

"It can be difficult for them to breathe and keep up the busy pace of their work, which can be very physical while having these restrictions," she said. "We've got face shields that will fog up when they're breathing and working, so it's been a huge adjustment."

That discomfort led Mountain Ridge to reduce frequency of scheduling so staffers would have time between patients to change their personal protective equipment and make sure any stray aerosols have time to settle.

At Bond Family Dentistry, nothing team members wear leaves the building, including shoes, Bond said. "Everything that's included is washed, and we cover our N-95 masks with another mask, a face shield and glasses. For us to have any exposure is going to be pretty minimal."

"We don't have our waiting room functioning anymore," he said. "People wait in their cars. We go and get them directly. We screen them by asking them questions, we take their temperature. Employees do the same thing when they come into work. We limit the amount of interaction in the hall, even. We try not to have patients crossing each other in the hall."

The biggest impact of a nearly two-month shutdown has been on revenue, but the Payroll Protection Plan loans through the Small Business Administration helped. Bond received $90,000 but said "being closed probably cost me as much as the loan I got" and DePorter's accountant was wary of spending any of the PPP loan Mountain Ridge received, just over $28,000, on anything other than payroll — not even rent — even though the practice lost potential revenue of up to $150,000. For a startup, that's pretty huge for us," DePorter said.

"Of all things we've spent during the past couple months, that loan was not really a concern to me," she said, "mostly because I never count on the government to give me anything so I wasn't even hopeful we'd get it, to be honest."

During the shutdown, Bond treated only emergency cases such as root canals and broken teeth, and DePorter said she was told "that if the patient wouldn't take up an emergency room in a hospital, we should not see them."

"It was a scary time, just because there was still a great lack of information about what we were dealing with and the guidance from above was really strict," said DePorter.

If a spike in COVID-19 cases this fall leads the state to order another shutdown, Bond said, "I'd petition against that. I don't think it's healthy for the economy as a whole." However, he added, he'd advise a new dentist to "plan on making some adjustments to the normal routine. Make it the new normal. It's inconvenient but it's also for safety."

DePorter agreed.

"I truly thought when we shut down that we'd be closed only for a week. So the surprise of it being extended for nearly two months was something that I guess I won't have to be surprised by again," she said.

"We always understood why we were shutting down, which was for the safety of our team and our community and our patients," DePorter said, "so I think we'd really have to focus on that part again — doing it for the greater good."

Elective procedure losses cost hospitals millions

By Dan Mika

dmika@bizwest.com

Hospitals and the health workers that staff them have been at the forefront of the COVID-19 pandemic, trying to handle the immense strain of treating a disease that has no cure and has claimed the lives of nearly 120,000 Americans.

But from a financial perspective, that heroism hasn't paid off.

According to consulting firm Kaufman Hall, the operating margin of the median American hospital fell 8% in April from the same month last year due to lost patient volumes and spending to beef up capacity for COVID patients.

That report estimates large hospital systems are suffering further due to scale, and that holds true for some of the biggest health-care players along the Front Range saying the coronavirus crisis has caused millions in lost revenue.

Profitable procedures down, costly critical care up

Not every patient and procedure is equally profitable to a hospital, and the amount of profit or loss a provider takes is based on numerous factors. In general, a hospital covers its losses from caring for patients who may be covered by low-reimbursing Medicaid insurance or are facing expensive acute care needs by offering a mix of elective procedures that may draw in patients with higher-reimbursing insurance policies.

But in mid-March, Colorado's COVID-19 response both prioritized hospitals to build out additional critical care capacity for what would become a wave of almost 4,200 hospitalizations by the end of May and banned them from doing elective procedures to minimize use of personal protective equipment and spread of the disease through the hospitals.

SCL Health said it spent $560,000 in preparing parts of Good Samaritan Medical Center in Lafayette for COVID patients, while UCHealth paid $16 million to build up its response capacity across the state.

That ban on procedures expired at the end of April, and medical providers are now operating on a limited capacity to make sure they have the ability to respond to a possible second wave of COVID cases. They have also been guided by the state to avoid procedures that require blood transfusions or follow-up care in an intensive care ward or inpatient rehabilitation center.

While many local systems say elective procedure schedules are starting to fill back up, the financial damage from months of lost appointments has already been done.

SCL Health said Good Samaritan lost an estimated $7.2 million in March and April, amounting to a 65% decline. In the same period, UCHealth said it lost $170 million in revenue after adding in some savings.

In an interview with BizWest, Banner Health western division chief financial officer Matt Huff said bookings for several procedures fell between 30% to 50% from mid-March on, with cancer screening volumes declining 90%.

Overall, Banner has lost between 20% to 30% of its revenues in March and April compared to the same months last year.

The stark loss in revenue led Banner Health to furlough between 5% to 7% of its staff nationwide in late April because those employees had “low or no work” due to widespread shutdowns in elective procedures.

Federal aid, but not enough

Through the CARES Act, the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services gave out more than $493 million in funding to more than a million public and private medical providers across Colorado.

That covered some of the losses of revenue for area hospitals. Good Samaritan received $6.2 million in those funds, while UCHealth got $97.5 million. Boulder Community Health received $4.48 million.

“These funds are essential to helping us reduce our significant financial losses, and the support will help some rural hospitals avoid closing their doors permanently,” UCHealth Chief Financial Officer Dan Riber said. “However, the funds represent a small fraction of hospitals’ overall losses.”

Other health operators are also facing a question about their CARES funding similar to non-health-care companies that landed funds from the Paycheck Protection Act, which is making them hesitant to spend it.

Banner received just over $15 million in its Colorado facilities.

However, Huff said the system has yet to recognize all of its federal funds because it’s still determining how to use it in a way that will make sure it is converted into a forgivable grant.

“That’s really driven by the hyper focus on the expense side given the fixed nature of a lot of costs in health care, the minimum staffing that comes with some of the areas that just have to stay open even when there’s no volume,” he said.

State funding to drop?

Colorado legislators are scrambling to cut more than $3 billion from the state’s budget caused by the loss of tax revenue from stay-at-home orders and business shutdowns, and are all but certain to cut into health-care spending as part of a broad budget balance push. In particular, the Joint Budget Committee has recommended reducing the provider rate it pays to hospitals as part of its Medicaid expansion by 1%, which would save the state an estimated $30 million.

The committee also suggested taking $160 million in fees paid by hospitals that are redistributed to other health-care providers covering higher numbers of uninsured and Medicaid patients and rerouting it to the general fund.

Those proposals have yet to be debated among lawmakers as of May 28.

Huff said that uncertainty over state funding is what worries him most, especially as many of Banner’s hospitals serve a higher proportion of Medicaid patients or uninsured patients whose treatment may later be written off.

“We’re already seeing increases to the tune of multiple percentage points of increases in self-pay or uninsured (patients),” he said.

Hospitals say they'll be ready for next wave

By Dallas Heltzell
news@bizwest.com

The region is in the process of returning to normal — or whatever the new normal will be — as the deadly COVID-19 pandemic appears to be waning thanks to a virtual shutdown of public gatherings.

But with nearly 1,600 coronavirus-related deaths statewide and about 120,000 across the nation, the question looms: What if there's a spike in cases this fall?

Health-care executives in the Boulder Valley and Northern Colorado believe they're ready to face it, thanks to the lessons they've learned this spring — some challenging but many surprising and gratifying. Most wondrous, agreed the hospital leaders who spoke May 13 at a BizWest "Front Lines" webinar, was the cooperation between otherwise fierce competitors.

"We've been on the phone with each other daily. This has really brought us all together," said Dr. Robert Vissers, president and chief executive of Boulder Community Health. "You're going to see a global health system that is better for it."

"I know there are a lot of people concerned about secondary surges," he said, but added that "we all believe that our monitoring is in place to see it coming a lot more quickly. We have the ability now to increase our capacity dramatically. So we're in a much better place than we were a couple of months ago, from equipment to capacity preparedness and to meet any future surge."

"At the end of it, we'll look back, despite the devastation, and see this as a success story."

"The collaboration between the hospitals, the cities and counties, and the communication has been great to see," added Kevin Unger, president and chief executive of UCHHealth in Northern Colorado.

Dr. Andrew French, chief medical officer for Centura Health, offered examples: To meet the demand for personal protective equipment, Centura began producing its own gowns, and ended up making so many of them that it was able to supply them to other health-care systems. Team members also built their own equipment for mask reprocessing and sterilization using ultraviolet light.

At SCL Health's Good Samaritan Medical Center in Lafayette, president Jennifer Alderfer said staffers have sewed together more than 9,000 face masks using sterile wraps, have built their own face shields, and have converted traditional anesthesia machines to use as ventilators.

Margo Karsten, western division president for Banner Health, said her teams had developed cost-efficient employee screening processes that Banner can offer to universities and larger employers. "Reach out to any of us," she said. "We want to be a safe community."

Social-distancing requirements also fueled technological advances, the executives agreed, especially the use of "telehealth" and other forms of virtual connection between doctors, patients and families. French cited the case of a husband and wife who both were hospitalized for COVID-19 infection. They had to be housed in separate rooms, but could communicate with each other using iPads normally used for telehealth visits.

"Emotionally, socially and mentally," French said, "there's been some bright spots that will be helpful as we determine what the new normal is."

Increasing the number of virtual visits has helped hospitals alleviate the strain of crowding in emergency rooms and intensive-care units — and, French noted, a side benefit has been less need for doctors and nurses to change their personal protective gear between visits.

"We were able to double and triple our capacity in intensive care," Unger said. Before the onset of the pandemic, he added, UCHHealth hospitals and clinics in the region recorded 110 to 120 virtual visits a week — but now it averages 4,000 virtual visits a day.

Alderfer said Good Sam held 70 telehealth visits in February but 6,500 in March. Instead of sit-down staff meetings, she added, they're now done virtually using Google Hangouts.

"Within UCHHealth, we're doing things in weeks or days that used to take months and weeks," Unger said. "So everything has been very speeded up. I'm pleasantly surprised at the pace at which health systems can adapt and make things happen."

He also hailed the cooperation and generous aid his facilities have gotten from their surrounding communities.

"Businesses that I know are suffering have gone above and beyond to support our health system," he said. "Restaurants that I know are challenged just to make ends meet have been feeding our staff, which I know is much appreciated."

Kevin Unger, president and chief executive of UCHHealth in Northern Colorado

And internally, he added, “I have never heard during this pandemic anybody say ‘That’s not my job.’ Everybody has stepped up in incredible ways.”

Dealing with the pandemic also has led to some worrisome issues, the executives agreed, especially the fact that many non-COVID patients seem reluctant to come to the hospital for normal or acute care for fear of contracting the virus. “We’re all starting to see the consequences of delayed care,” Vissers said.

“ER volumes are down, and we’re concerned about that,” Karsten said. “People are delaying their care.”

She said Banner Health has assembled on its website a list of precautionary steps it’s taking at its facilities, adding that “If you come in, you’re going to be safe.”

Unger also noted an uptick in length of stay for patients admitted to the hospital. “COVID patients are more challenging to take care of and they are in the hospital quite a bit longer,” he said. “It’s very resource intensive.”

Vissers also acknowledged the financial hit health-care facilities and their staffs have taken.

COVID has “highlighted some of the failures in our reimbursement model,” he said. “Every one of us is going to have a really, really hard year economically. It’s hard to think of a year where we’ve really stepped up to serve the community in a more meaningful way, but if this isn’t a call for action and change, I don’t know what is.”

What worries Karsten most about the possibility of a surge in COVID-19 cases this fall, she said, is that “we don’t know when they’re going to happen. And what I’m curious about is a combination of flu and COVID and what that would look like for our community.”

So before autumn, she said, “the best thing we can do as health partners is to educate the community. Let’s get you super healthy this summer. Walk. Run. We don’t want to see you tucked in our beds. And I think if we can do a full-court press on health providers, it’ll help.”

The biggest key to preparation, Vissers said, is to remember “all that work and preparation that we did beforehand, we all anticipate it doesn’t go away and it will pay off.”

Part of that success came from the spirit of cooperation among the region’s health-care entities, Karsten said.

“We’re going to have to keep these partnerships together,” she said. “Our job, collectively, is to keep the community healthy and keep us safe. We can only do that working together, not competing around COVID — and then we can face the fall together in that manner.”

Lost job?

3 main insurance options still apply

By Dallas Heltzell
news@bizwest.com

It's an unprecedented situation.

One in four U.S. workers have filed for unemployment compensation since the COVID-19 pandemic began, according to federal Labor Department figures. Many of those workers who were laid off have lost their employer-provided health insurance and frantically are looking for options.

But despite the demand, insurance premiums generally haven't risen, and insurance providers say it's because fewer people are seeking care — either because doctors' offices and clinics are closed or have severely-restricted access, or because would-be patients are wary of contracting the potentially deadly coronavirus.

Benefits generally cease immediately when a worker is laid off, as opposed to a furlough, which basically is an unpaid leave of absence.

"What we've mostly been doing is furloughs" at the University of Colorado Boulder, said Ken McConnellogue, CU's vice president for communications, "so with furloughs, people are allowed to continue their health insurance. I'm not saying that we won't have layoffs, but right now, mostly for our employees, they're able to maintain their health insurance."

So what are the options for those who have lost their jobs? The same ones that existed before, said Mark Creek, a Longmont-based independent health-insurance broker:

- COBRA, which allows people to stay on their employer's benefit programs for at least 18 months.
- Individual health insurance through Connect for Health Colorado, the state health-care exchange set up under the Affordable Care Act.
- Medicaid, administered statewide by Colorado PEAK.

"A lot of people will go to Medicaid if they can," Creek said. "A lot of times, if you lose your job outright, the state will put you directly on Medicaid, so they'll try that first. Sometimes if they've had some income in the past — and it depends on your age, or how many are in your family — they may not qualify for it. But if they don't qualify for Medicaid, there's a good chance they'll get a tax credit, and that brings the cost of the insurance they can get on the exchange down a bit."

Open enrollment for plans under Connect for Health Colorado occurs at the end of the year, but the state reopened it during April to aid laid-off or furloughed workers. Even though that window closed April 30, Creek said, "If you lose your job and your coverage, that's considered a life-changing event and you can enroll."

Receiving coverage under Medicaid is generally quicker than going through the exchange, Creek said, "but it takes them awhile to get through on the phone and get the coverage. The faster way is to do it online."

Coverage under COBRA, the Consolidated Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act, "is generally a lot more expensive," Creek said, but its out-of-pocket payments for health-care services generally are lower.

"If you're single and make less than $49,000 a year, there's a good chance you can get a tax credit to help pay for a plan on the exchange," said Creek, who helps clients navigate the various options. However, he added, those monthly credits vary widely.

"I had somebody yesterday, it was $13, and a week ago I had one that was $1,245," he said. "So it's a big difference. A lot of that depends on your age and what your income is. If you're close to the line where you get Medicaid but you're over it, you'll probably get a bigger tax credit."

Some employers are able to aid their laid-off workers by reimbursing some COBRA premiums or continuing their benefit programs even if they can't contribute to them.

The pandemic has brought several bits of assistance for laid-off workers seeking health coverage: the federal stimulus checks, which often amounted to $1,200, and the federal guidelines that waived the one-week waiting period for state unemployment benefits. The maximum jobless benefit has been extended from 26 to 39 weeks, in accordance with federal guidelines.

A big factor in which insurance option to choose is whether a person expects to be working again soon, Creek said.

"Somebody might be in the entertainment industry" that got totally shut down during the height of the pandemic, Creek said. "If you're working with bands or concerts or theater, when's that going to come back? All of a sudden they don't have any income right now. They were making pretty good money and all of a sudden it's gone. Poof!"

"But if somebody's an IT person, they can get a job pretty quickly."

An advantage for laid-off or furloughed workers, he said, is that they can cancel the temporary coverage at any time if they return to their previous job or get a new one with health-care benefits.

Gyms face extra challenges from COVID

ALI C. M. WATKINS/BIZWEST

By Dan England

news@bizwest.com

Craig Havekost is a masters bodybuilding champion and the owner of Prodigy Gym in Fort Collins, but after he reopened in the wake of the coronavirus, he gave himself another title: janitor.

Gyms, Havekost admitted, are hard places to keep clean. People sweat and shower and use chalk and stuff. But now instead of giving training advice, or perhaps in addition to it, Havekost pledged to follow his customers around with a bottle of disinfectant.

"I'm the owner, and I'm willing to do everything it takes to make this work," Havekost said.

It's been insane, Havekost said with a grunt, since he opened May 1 under strict guidelines after nearly two months. He was by himself until he secured some government money and hired trainers to work with groups of four under the regulations (with 10 or fewer in the facility). He hoped to be host his regular hours of 5 a.m. to 10 p.m. soon (he might be now as you read this), but he was also contemplating staying open until 1 a.m. or opening at 3 a.m. to help cover the demand for one-hour shifts his customers have to book to work out. Once they do, they need to follow his trainers, with a little independence, both to follow guidelines and so he knows what to clean next.

"They have to be in the same room and work the same body part so I can clean when they are done," Havekost said.

Havekost admitted to some frustration at the way gyms are perceived, even as he did admit they are harder to clean.

"We actually have much more control than any other business," he said. "We certainly do more than Wal-Mart or Kings Soopers. Fewer than 150 people are coming through my doors every day, and every single thing that gets touched is getting cleaned. You've got thousands going into those stores touching everything. I don't see the logic as to why gyms are so dangerous."

It's a confusing world, and some of the major gym corporations in Colorado, including Vasa and Genesis, didn't want to give specifics, though Genesis did say a reopening plan was on its website, and Vasa didn't have a plan as of yet (again, though, that could change by the time you read this). That's why some gym owners just, um, threw in the towel: Tom Forsyth of his Team Tom Gym in the Greeley Mall converted into a T-shirt printing shop now called Double Shot Printing. Team Tom also now operates as a personal training studio. All gyms operated that way as of May 1 until regulations were loosened a bit, but Forsyth doesn't plan to go back to a full gym operation.

His gym was established in 2011 and found some success, enough to cover free memberships to veterans and law enforcement officers. But it got tougher last year when 24-Hour Fitness opened up across the street from his parking lot and oil and gas workers moved out of town after those prices plummeted. The coronavirus was the last straw.

"I don't even have a clue as to what running a full on gym would entail with where we are right now," Forsyth said. "There's just no way the gym will recover from all that."

In fact, the 24-Hour Fitness national chain filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy in June and closed the Greeley location along with facilities in Fort Collins and Broomfield.

Kaci Drury began leading virtual gym sessions for her clients once COVID shut down her business, Fit4Mom. Drury hires moms to lead workout sessions for other moms and their kids. The virtual sessions over Zoom allowed her clients to see each other and stick to a schedule.

"I know for a lot of us, that's helping to keep us sane," Drury said. "We help keep each other motivated and accountable."

Drury and her other trainers used malls and parks as meeting places before the coronavirus, so it's possible that she could have continued on as normal (outside of the malls). But Drury didn't want to take any chances.

"Since we are a business, no one was supposed to be doing anything," she said. "We are just trying to be cautious. Our moms were more comfortable staying at home. We have some with pregnancies, and we all had kids or little ones."

Her roster of about 30 clients stayed stable, and Drury charged them all a mid-point fee, as she bases her fees based on how many times they attend per week. She hopes to get back out to the parks in June and use a combination of virtual and live workouts.

"We just want to ease back into things," Drury said. "I do know we are all really ready to start connecting again."
