Varicose Veins

I have veins in my legs that are discolored and painful. What are these and how are they treated?

- ▶ Varicose veins are superficial veins that are dilated and bulge under the skin. They can be blue or purple in color and are often found behind the knees and in calves and thighs.
- ▶ They can cause swelling, aching in the legs and damage to the skin leading to open wounds.
- ▶ Varicose veins are treated with a laser procedure to seal the vein.
- ▶ Spider veins are tiny blood vessels below the surface of the skin.
- ▶ These are treated, via injection, through a method called sclerotherapy that causes the vein walls to collapse.

HERE'S THE BEST REASON TO WORK FOR BETTER MEDICINE.

At COPIC, our mission is to improve medicine in the communities we serve. We do this by offering trusted medical liability coverage with an emphasis on patient safety resources and education. Our efforts extend into supporting the development of health care professionals, from training for medical students to funding advanced simulation technology. And the COPIC Medical Foundation has provided more than $4 million in grants since 1992 for initiatives that improve the quality of patient care. All of this contributes to a health care system that focuses on what matters most—better medicine and better lives.

As the health care industry expands, becoming more complicated to maneuver and expensive day by day, the Northern Colorado Business Report is pleased to publish our latest iteration of Northern Colorado MD.

This medical directory contains a wealth of information for both health-care professionals and consumers. Our research department has carefully compiled listings of individual practitioners, arranged by specialty, as well as health care facilities located throughout Larimer and Weld counties. You'll find nearly 1,000 physicians and 525 clinics in these listings.

Inside you will also find 10 rankings for which the Business Report is known, comparing facilities ranging from assisted living centers to surgery centers by a variety of criteria.

Our newsroom also has produced a series of articles that we hope you find timely and useful.

I want to thank our chief researcher, Mariah Gant, for completing this massive project. She received an unprecedented level of assistance and cooperation from staff at both Banner Health and Poudre Valley Health System, for which we are extremely grateful.

Thanks also to all the advertisers who supported this project, especially our cover sponsors, COPIC Insurance and Kaiser. We couldn't have done it without you.

Anxiety in the ranks

Why doctors today are less satisfied than ever with their work

By Maggie Shafer
mshafer@ncbr.com

In a field where salaries have gone down, workload has gone up and the uncertainty of new reforms has made the future hard to predict, it's no wonder almost half the nation's doctors regret the decision to have ever entered medical school.

According to Medscape, a WebMD unit, more than 46 percent of doctors who participated in its 2012 Physician Compensation Survey said if they could do it all over, they wouldn't have chosen medicine as a career – a significant leap from the 31 percent last year.

"We're at a potential point of significant change," said Adam Atherly, the chair of the Department of Health Systems, Management and Policy and an associate professor at the Colorado School of Public Health. "Physicians are nervous and I believe they have good reason to be. They're facing a possible radical restructuring of how health care is delivered."

This comes at a time when doctors and doctors-to-be are needed more than ever. Because of the aging population and influx of Medicare patients expected under national health care reforms, The Association of American Medical Colleges is projecting a shortage of 130,000 physicians by 2025 – with the largest shortage in primary care (family medicine, internal medicine, pediatrics, gynecology and general surgery).

Their reasons for dissatisfaction are varied, but many doctors in Northern Colorado point gloved fingers at the health care reforms passed

JONATHAN CASTNER

Dr. James Dickinson says the future of medicine is now "determined by larger forces than how we care for ... patients."

under the Obama administration. They also worry about losing control of their practice and lower government reimbursements for care provided to Medicare patients.

"There's a lot of waiting, watching and wondering what will happen," said Ann Hudgens, the executive director of Colorado State University's Health Network, which is comprised of medical, mental health and health education and prevention services for students. "Everyone is a little worried."

Dr. James Dickinson, a general surgeon with Northern Colorado Surgical Associates in Fort Collins, has been in the field for 12 years. He said the changes can be more than unsettling.

"It used to be about certainty in medicine, but we've entered into an era where no one knows what's going to happen," he said. "The future of medicine is determined by larger forces than how well we care for our patients."

Brandon Wright, a medical resident at Poudre Valley Hospital, entered the field because of his interest in biology, physiology and anatomy, and a desire to truly help people. He's starting his career in family medicine in a very different climate than when he entered medical school.

"If I had the choice to go to medical school again, I am unsure if I would go or not," he said. "It is so much work and costs so much money, that I am sure I would be able to find a job just as fulfilling, though maybe not a well-paying, and not have to endure the stress that medical school and residency can put on a person."

One of the big causes for uncertainty is the payment that doctors will receive for treating patients on Medicare. Some in Congress want to cut physician reimbursement rates.

"From an economics perspective, if you reduce the reimbursement on Medicare, you can expect the supply to go down," said Atherly. "I think we can expect a lot of early retirements (of doctors)."

Dickinson said if reimbursements fall and millions of Americans are added to Medicare under the health care reforms, he fears fewer doctors will provide their services to Medicare patients. "They (the doctors) won't be able to afford it anymore," he said.

Politics, not surprisingly, have entered the equation.

"Most doctors can't decide what they charge," said Nathan Lamborn, the president and founder of the Colorado University School of Medicine chapter of the Benjamin Rush Society, named for the physician and founding father. "With Medicare and Medicaid patients, they just have to accept what the rate is. This puts them at the mercy of lawmakers."

Lamborn, the son of Rep. Doug Lamborn, R-Colo., and a CSU graduate who did his surgical clerkship at Medical Center of the Rockies and Poudre Valley Hospital, started the campus' Benjamin Rush Society to advocate for "the sanctity of the patient-physician relationship and the protection from encroachment of outside forces."

Recent society events and discussion have revolved around Obama's Patient Protection and Affordable Care Act.

The legislation is aimed at making health care more accessible and affordable for uninsured Americans, but many doctors have experienced the brunt of what they feel to be its early effects on their paychecks.

The majority of physicians made less in 2011 than the previous year.

General surgeons saw the largest drop, 12 percent, while orthopedic surgeons and radiologists' annual compensation fell by 10 percent. On the other hand, ophthalmologists saw a 9 percent rise and pediatricians' income grew 5 percent.

American doctors are still the highest paid in the world by far. Medscape found physicians in the Southwest U.S. (including Colorado, Utah, Arizona and New Mexico) made a median of $190,000 last year – far above the state's average income of $55,000.

Another common health reform-related complaint among practitioners is a lack of efficiency due to an increase in what some doctors claim to be unnecessary paperwork. Medscape's survey found that increased documentation and regulation "take the joy out of medicine" for physicians.

Dickinson said the growing levels of required paperwork take doctors away from patients, making them less efficient, and are riddled with "waste" – all things that have taken a toll on physicians' morale.

"Some of the new regulations don't make any sense, and aren't really about cost-savings," he said. "In some ways they're actually getting in the way of efficient medicine. Everyone feels reform is necessary, but the government misses the mark here."

CSU has made an effort to decrease that burden on its doctors.

The school's health services have changed the typical appointment length from 15 minutes to 20, a notable increase when time with patients in most doctors' offices is shrinking.

"This is a significant change, especially for these doctors who got into the field because of the patient interaction," Hudgens said. "That is the heart of why our doctors are in the college health business."

Still, Hudgen's describes working for CSU, in light of the current reform, as a "mixed bag." The doctors at Hartshorn (the health center at CSU) make less than their counterparts in the private sector, but are also more insulated from the economic stresses facing other physicians.

Mergers of major hospitals and health care providers (like the one between Poudre and the University of Colorado Hospital in January) are an additional cause of concern among doctors. The mergers, which allow hospitals to reduce fixed costs and gain market share, make it more difficult for private practitioners to stay competitive, and decrease the individual doctor's autonomy – something highly valued in a career that costs hundreds of thousands of dollars in college tuition and years of study.

Despite all of these concerns, medical school enrollment is still expected to rise 30 percent from 2002 levels by 2016, according to the AAMC. But with more students going into higher-paid specialties and avoiding the longer hours and lower wages of primary care, the projected shortage of physicians will remain a problem.

"I still think it's a great career, and a great opportunity for young people," said Dickinson. "But it's going to change, and it's going to change fast."

Medicaid expansion under way

Colorado among first to offer coverage to adults without kids

By Molly Armbrister, marmbrister@ncbr.com

Colorado recently became one of the few states in the nation to expand its Medicaid program, offering coverage for the first time to adults without children.

Like so much having to do with Medicaid, it hasn't been easy.

With money tight, the state decided to cap the number of enrollees in the expansion to just 10,000 residents, people earning only 10 percent or less of the federal poverty level. That meant leaving out tens of thousands of other Coloradans who earn more but are still unable to afford health insurance.

As it turned out, far fewer people than expected were signing up, with just about 6,000 applications filed by the middle of May.

Nearly 600,000 Coloradans are on Medicaid at the moment, including about 70,000 children on Child Health Plan. Until recently, Medicaid in the state was limited to poor children, pregnant women, the disabled and some elderly. The reason for this is that Medicaid is funded through a dollar-for-dollar match from the federal government to help cover those demographics, but offers no matching funds for adults without kids.

That all changed when the Affordable Care Act passed. Under the legislation, states can now get matching funds to help cover adults without dependent children. The catch is that the states have to come up with their portion of the money.

In Colorado, that money comes from a new hospital provider fee, enacted by the state legislature in 2009 to fund a number of Medicaid-related expenditures, including the "AwDC" program, as it has been dubbed by state health officials.

The fee is assessed on all inpatient days and outpatient charges, so the amount paid by each hospital varies, according to Rachel Reiter of the Department of Health Care Policy and Financing.

For hospitals, paying the fee means fewer unpaid bills because of a higher number of people on Medicaid.

The federal government provides a 50 percent match for provider fees, meaning that every dollar in fees collected from hospitals is matched by $1 in federal funding.

AwDC is available to Colorado residents ages 19 to 64 who do not meet eligibility requirements for other Medicaid programs or Medicare.

There are stringent income requirements to be eligible for the program as well, according to Debra Scott, COO of Sunrise Community Health in Evans.

In order to enroll, applicants can make no more than $90 per month.

"This program will help 10,000 very low-income Coloradans who did not have access to health insurance previously,” said Susan Birch, executive director of the Colorado Department of Health Care Policy and Financing.

On the flip side, it still leaves out many more.

The Affordable Care Act specifies that Medicaid coverage can be extended to all residents whose income is at the federal poverty line, about $11,170. The money Colorado expects to generate from the new hospital fee is not enough to cover the roughly 144,000 adults in the state who make that much money.

As a consequence, the program was scaled back to include only those making $1,080 or less per year. Although the state estimates that there are approximately 50,000 Coloradans living at this level, it capped the number of those eligible to enroll in the expansion to 10,000.

Moreover, the state set up a lottery that will assign benefits by county so that the funds are distributed evenly throughout Colorado.

As of May 17, the state had received 6,000 applications from residents who had been determined as eligible for the program. Enrolling the applicants began in the latter part of May.

Advocates for the poor said they expect the 10,000 figure to be reached by summer.

Historically, those living at the lowest income levels without insurance end up going to the emergency room to receive care, because they knew they could not afford a regular doctor visit.

State Rep. Dave Young introduced a bill in this year’s legislative session that would allow health care providers to partner with the state health department to create pilot programs to restructure the Medicaid payment system.

Specifically, the goal of the legislation, which was passed, is to incentivize better outcomes for patients by moving away from the current “fee-for-service” payment system to a system in which doctors and other providers are rewarded for better outcomes.

Both Young, a Democrat from Greeley, and Gov. John Hickenlooper lauded the legislation, as well as Medicaid reform in general, at an event in May at Monfort Park in Greeley.

The event featured a mobile medical clinic operated by the North Colorado Health Alliance, which focuses on caring for low-income Coloradans.

Across the country, Democrats say that the expansion of Medicaid will save money long-term, but their counterparts on the other side of the aisle strongly disagree.

State Republicans are fighting Medicaid expansion, as are those at the federal level, arguing that the program is too expensive and can’t be sustained.

“The state can’t afford it, the economy can’t maintain it, and we’re just lying telling people we can cover everything we put on paper that we cover,” Colorado GOP State Sen. Shawn Mitchell said.

Pushing

less-invasive, less-costly medical options

Shifting the focus to quality of care,
instead of quantity.

By Ivy Hughes, news@ncbr.com

Every patient wants the best medical care possible and, in the minds of most Americans today, the best care is the most expensive.

But is it?

The American College of Physicians is urging patients with newly diagnosed diabetes and back pain not to opt for the latest-and-supposedly-greatest.

It's part of a new campaign to steer patients – and their doctors – to what the College of Physicians calls “high value care,” and away from expensive tests and treatments that they say aren't any better — and often are worse.

That's an altogether new way of thinking in health care but one that a growing number of people in the industry say is necessary if rising costs are ever to slow.

So far, the College of Physicians, working with Consumer Reports, has identified 37 tests and treatments that may not provide good health care value.

For example, according to the organization's findings, patients are paying $230 to $370 per prescription for new Type 2 diabetes drugs such as Actos or Januvia. Not only do these drugs cost more than older drugs like metformin, which is $4 to $14 a prescription, they're associated with dangerous side effects such as heart attack and stroke.

The College of Physicians also determined that X-rays, CT scans, MRIs and other diagnostic tests ordered for people with low back pain often lead to unnecessary, invasive procedures when a change in diet and exercise are often more effective. These procedures are costly — each test is $200 to $1,500 — and they come with the risk of cancer and radiation.

Moreover, the college's report showed that people who had an MRI in the first month were eight times more likely to have surgery and had a more than five-fold increase in medical expenses — but they didn't recover any faster than people who did not have an imaging test.

"We're not saying that expensive tests and treatments aren't worthwhile," said Dr. John Santa, director of the Consumer Reports Health Ratings Center. "They are, when they are proven to help save lives or help people live with less disability."

One good example: antiretroviral drugs to treat HIV infection. "Those drugs provide good value, even though they are expensive, because they work well against a very serious problem," Santa said.

But often, the best treatment may well be far less expensive or intrusive.

John Bender, co-owner of Fort Collins-based Miramont Family Medicine, has been watching the issue with growing frustration.

"Last year, 34 primary-care doctors (in Northern Colorado) shut their doors," he said. "Fewer people are going to their primary-care doctor and more are going to a high-cost center like an emergency room for sore throats and ankle pain. That is not sustainable."

Bender said he believes the solution lies in part in eliminating today's pay-for-fee approach to health care.

"Primary-care physicians are not paid very well when they do in-depth counseling on diet, exercise or food choices," he said.

Instead, they're paid for seeing patients and the more they see, the more they earn.

The system, he said, emphasizes quantity of care over quality, and high-cost procedures over preventative care.

Three years ago, Miramont was one of 17 Colorado practices to participate in a pilot program in which insurers paid then a flat monthly fee to pay for services that do not fall under the traditional fee-for-service model.

The insurers pay Miramont approximately $200,000 a year, or about 5 percent of the practice's budget, to provide these services.

It's working.

"The insurers are so excited about this because Miramont has a much lower readmission rate and hospitalization rate," Bender said.

Miramont has been able to do this by taking a number of steps.

For example, by hiring a diabetic nurse educator, it has been able to get more of its diabetic patients on diet-and-exercise plans rather than passing them off to off-site specialists or giving them a pill.

Miramont also instituted an electronic medical tracking system. Type 2 diabetes patients need special blood tests every three months. Before the electronic system, only 40 percent of Miramont's diabetic patients came in as scheduled. Now 85 to 90 percent come in for the tests, thanks to the reminders they're sent.

"Part of the reason diabetes is such a huge problem in the U.S. is that it's treated as a cottage industry instead of working like a Toyota production model," Bender said.

The insurers have agreed to continue the pilot and, if funding comes through, the federal government will launch a similar pilot in seven states.

"Hopefully we'll see more and more insurance companies committed to this model," Bender said.

The potential for medical malpractice lawsuits can also drive up costs, as some physicians order unnecessary tests for fear that if they don't, they'll be taken to court.

"There's pressures in a variety of areas, but one is that there's some defensive medicine that's being practiced," said College of Physicians Board of Regents Chair Phyllis Guze. "There's a fear that you'll be sued if you don't rule out everything."

The organization, she said, will continue releasing its "High Value Care" studies in hopes that they help patients and their physicians better manage care and costs.

"Patients are less likely to choose (costly) interventions when they're fully informed," Guze said. "It's not just because they're trying to save money, but because they would like to be a part of the decision-making process."

Demand high for health care professionals

By Dan Cook, news@ncbr.com

Two major trends are driving demand in the health care industry for people from completely different worlds: nurse practitioners and information technologists.

The former are in high demand as nurse practitioners continue to take on more of the hands-on patient care in hospitals and clinics throughout Northern Colorado. Meanwhile, as more health care organizations are finally biting the bullet and investing in electronic records management systems, human resources managers are scrambling to find IT people with the right training to help them implement these costly and complex systems.

These are hardly the only positions that health care organizations are trying to fill these days.

Hospitalists are also in high demand. These specialized physicians, trained specifically to perform tasks in hospitals, represent a job category that has evolved in the wake of the hospital construction explosion that has transformed the industry in the last decade-plus. Physician assistants also are in high demand because they enable physicians to spend more time with their more seriously ill patients.

There's still plenty of openings for registered nurses, too.

The state labor department reported in April that there were nearly twice as many ads for registered nurses as there were for the No. 2 category, retail salespersons. The top two employers measured by job ads were healthcare providers Health One and Centura Health.

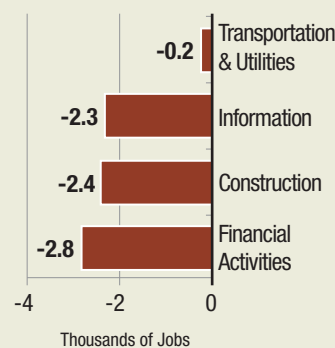

Hospital systems will continue to expand – and hire – as Northern Colorado's population ages, said economist John Green. That expansion will be fueled by retirees moving to Northern Colorado for its climate, he said, keeping demand in the region strong for healthcare workers for at least the next two decades.

"Retirees moving here will require more healthcare service, leading to the construction of more nursing facilities and other services for the elderly," he said.

And, at the other end of the educational spectrum, clinics are busy hiring back-shop help such as quality-resource managers, lab technicians, physical therapists, credentialing and claims experts and care coordinators.

It's all part of the ongoing resurgence of the region's health care industry, which is the primary jobs engine throughout the entire state.

The significance of health care's place in the economy can hardly be understated.

According to the most recent U.S. Bureau of Labor Statistics data, in the Denver area alone, nearly 90,000 were employed in healthcare-related jobs at the beginning of 2012 — 13 percent of all employment positions. That was the second-largest segment behind the more general office-admin support category. Loveland-Fort Collins reported that 10 percent of its 127,420 jobs were in a healthcare-related position.

This year began with a robust forecast for jobs growth in health care. Forecasters saw it as one of the three major jobs-creation segments, along with education and professional and business services, where jobseekers are finally finding opportunities as the economy generally improves.

But healthcare should continue to be the rock star of the recovery throughout the state, experts agree. And although nurses and physicians are always in demand, some new hot jobs are beginning to bubble up.

As a fast-growing organization, Poudre Valley Health Systems, based in Longmont, is constantly sorting through piles of resumes looking for just the right people.

This year, the company will likely receive 55,000 applications, said Chris Thorp, manager for recruitment for PVHS, which has 5,500 employees, most of whom are in Northern Colorado.

"We are in a growth pattern and are definitely hiring. Our immediate ongoing needs include nurses and several key support positions," Thorp said.

She said the more difficult-to-fill positions include experienced nurses, business analysts in the IT department with experience in electronic records-keeping systems, coding specialists and medical technologists who work in the lab.

"We are looking for the most experienced people we can find," she said.

In mid-June, Poudre will begin taking applications to staff up a new free-standing emergency department/ambulatory surgical facility in Greeley.

There are 100 full-time positions to fill, ranging from pharmacists to nurses to radiology department techs.

New models emerging in health care

Accountability, cost-control take center stage

By Dan McMillian, news@ncbr.com

The world of medical care is full of acronyms – HMOs, MRIs and ERs. Now there are two more to pay attention to – ACOs and PCMHs, or accountable care organizations and patient-centered medical homes.

Both are health-care delivery systems designed to solve the decades-old conundrum of how to deliver better care at a lower cost.

They share similarities, but differ in terms of scope with ACOs requiring what some call “infrastructure” – meaning many more parties at the table – and PCMHs designed more for implementation at the individual clinic level.

Both have caught the fancy of healthcare reformers, and, in large part, both depend upon getting back to the basic idea of patients and their primary-care doctors spending more time communicating.

It's easy to understand why the healthcare industry is interested in the two concepts, said Dr. David Abbey, a private practice physician with Internal Medicine Clinic of Fort Collins.

“The healthcare system is truly going over a cliff, and stopping that is going to require that things be done differently,” he said. “We can't wait for the system to collapse.”

At the root of the problem, according to healthcare experts, is the current fee-for-service system. That approach has created a demand for medical services such as tests that often are expensive and frequently not necessary. Exacerbating the problem is the fact that most primary-care physicians need to see a lot of patients every day and frequently only have a few minutes to spend with any given patient.

Along with more communication between doctor and patient, both models also require practitioners to demonstrate cost-savings and improved healthcare outcomes. In other words, they're going to be held more accountable. In essence, providers are rewarded for demonstrating positive outcomes, not ordering more services.

Dr. John Bender, owner of the Miramar Family Medicine Clinic and an ardent PCMH advocate, said his clinic reduced hospital admissions rates by 82 percent for its patients by embracing the approach.

CONFIDENTIAL SUPPORT ADVOCACY INFORMATION

"We're not saving the local community thousands of dollars," he said. "We're more likely saving them millions of dollars."

Right now, the PCMH model seems to be gaining the most traction.

In large part, that's because it's something an individual clinic can do on its own. Dr. Janet Seeley, a Fort Collins allergist and immunologist, said the PCMH typically requires the primary-care physician to be "the repository for the patients continuing care."

The ACO model, on the other hand, creates an entire patient-centered landscape that brings together multiple providers from large hospitals, to laboratories, to non-MD specialists, to pharmacies, to individual clinics, Seeley said.

"Really, the two concepts go hand-in-glove," she said.

But, to qualify as an ACO, a healthcare provider needs to build a lot of that infrastructure, Seeley said.

Organizations interested in becoming ACOs also are waiting for Medicare to come out with some final rules on what such an organization will look like, she said. Seeley expects to see more PCMHs spring up in the near term with ACOs coming together in stages.

Rulon Stacey, president and CEO of Poudre Valley Health System, was at first receptive but is now more of an ACO skeptic. "By defining and creating ACOs, the government has created a system so complex and so far removed from how health care is actually provided that a step backward is taken in the process. A few weeks ago, the details of how ACOs would be organized was published ... to the general shock of those in the industry," Stacey commented in a blog he writes.

"The healthcare system is truly going over a cliff, and stopping that is going to require that things be done differently."

— Dr. David Abbey, Internal Medicine Clinic

A competitor, Banner Health Network, is putting together a care model that adopts many ACO-like features, but that stops short of being an actual ACO, said Betty Patterson, area public relations director for Banner Health Western region.

The Northern Colorado trial involves Kaiser Permanente enrollees in Larimer and Weld counties. Kaiser does not operate hospitals in Colorado, unlike in other states, but entered a deal this year with Banner to enroll Banner patients in its health plans. It also will treat those patients at Kaiser clinics. Banner and Kaiser will adopt an ACO-like model when it comes to treating Kaiser patients in those two counties, Patterson said.

Progress on the PCMH model also is moving forward.

Along with Miramont, Associates in Family Medicine and the Youth Clinic, both of which have Fort Collins locations, also are examining the PCMH concept, Dr. Seeley said.

Dr. Christopher Stanley, senior medical director for United Healthcare Colorado, sees the PCMH as a crucial intermediate step on the way toward an ACO.

The PCMH model also has many working examples others can look to, something the ACO concept lacks. When asked how a PCMH works, he can always refer someone to Dr. Bender's clinic, Stanley said. United Healthcare currently is working with 16 clinics around the state as part of a PCMH pilot. Bender estimates that there probably are only 200 clinics in Colorado working under the PCMH model, so many more could be following this path soon.

A PCMH doesn't work simply by saving costs, he said. The goal isn't to limit access to necessary medical treatments, but to ensure the treatments actually are necessary and lead to a better patient experience, Stanley said. At his clinic, Bender said some 97 percent of patients say they are very happy with the shift to a PCMH.

Seeley sees herself as proof the concept works.

She was diagnosed with breast cancer at 33 while living in Sweden. She came back to the U.S. with no health insurance and was lucky to enroll in a National Institute of Health study. The study was conducted using many of the same practices as today's PCMHs. She was impressed with the quality of care and wants to see that quality become the national standard.

Frequently Asked Questions on ACOs and PCMHs

By Dan McMillian, news@ncbr.com

Two new concepts have emerged in the effort to find ways to deliver better medical care that is more cost-efficient.

Chances are you may even have heard about ACOs, or accountable care organizations, or the patient-centered medical home, PCMH.

While both are promoted as new ways of thinking, both are based on the old idea that better communication between doctor and patient and a team approach that involves the patient, primary physician, specialists, nurses and pharmacists will yield better care at a better price.

Following are quick answers to some basic questions.

What is an accountable care organization, or ACO?

As many wags have put it, an ACO is kind of like a unicorn. Everyone has an idea what it looks like, but no one has ever seen it. That is something of an exaggeration, but ACOs are still more of a concept than working model.

In general, an ACO is an organization of primary care physicians, hospitals and specialists, both MD and non-MD, who work together to provide care to a specific patient population. The organizations are accountable because they make more money for providing effective care, not by ordering lots of services such as expensive tests, as is the case with today's fee-for-service model.

What is a PCMH and how is it different from an ACO?

The basic approach, a team of coordinated health care professionals, is similar, but ACOs require a larger organization, which is probably why Northern Colorado medical practitioners right now seem more enthusiastic about the PCMH model.

The PCMH model is easily adopted by a single practice. The basic difference is that a PCMH is led by a patient's primary-care physician while the ACO consolidates care provided by several different organizations. The idea is that your doctor spends more time with you and brings in the nursing staff, outside specialists, even pharmacists at his or her discretion. Your doc also serves as the point person for all patient interaction.

Who pays for this?

Medical spending, regardless of how streamlined the federal government and insurance agencies try to make it, will never be simple and straightforward. With that caveat, the core idea behind an ACO is the A, or accountable. ACOs will make money if they spend less on care while improving care. When the expenses come in less than projected, the ACO keeps the rest as a bonus.

On the PCMH front, practitioners still receive some money from the current fee-for-service model, but they also charge patients a "care coordination" fee, a lump sum paid monthly. As with the ACO, the idea is that more efficient care will lead to healthier patients. If the model works, the practice makes money; if not, the practice loses money.

Private insurance companies and Medicare are both running ACO and PCMH pilot programs.

Why the interest in ACOs and PCMHs?

This one's simple. Rising health insurance costs have been an issue for decades now and lots of models – remember the HMOs of the 1990s? – have been tried, but costs keep going up.

At the same time, there's little evidence that all the money is making the average American healthier. If anything, we're becoming a less-healthy nation.

With Obama's Affordable Care Act looming in the background, the health care industry, from private practice doctors to major insurance companies, is scrambling to find a model that improves care in a measurable fashion at a lower cost.

Where can I learn more?

A simple web search using the two terms will yield lots of results, but here are a few sites we found especially valuable:

■ Kaiser Health News has an animated short film that gives a quick overview of the ACO concept.

■ The Patient-Centered Primary Care Collaborative has its own animated short explaining the PCMH concept. The site also has a PCMH FAQ available.

■ KevinMD.com has a good compare and contrast overview of the two concepts.

■ National Public Radio offers a clear explanation of the ACO concept and its pros and cons.

FINDING UNKNOWN HEALTH PROBLEMS EARLY SAVES LIVES

The earlier a health problem is detected, the better chance there is for a cure. Since 1976, Advanced Medical Imaging Consultants (AMIC) has helped doctors and their patients pinpoint unknown health problems using the most advanced medical imaging exams available. Our team includes over 27 board-certified radiologists, the majority of whom have completed subspecialty fellowship training. This high level of expertise ensures that our patients' diagnoses are thorough and accurate.

AMIC CAPABILITIES

- CT (computed tomography), including CTA (computed tomography angiography), CT cardiac calcium scoring, CT lung scan, and CT virtual colonoscopy
- Musculoskeletal/orthopedic radiology
- MRI (magnetic resonance imaging), including MRA (magnetic resonance angiography) and cardiac MRI
- Interventional radiology, including diagnostic angiography, carotid stenting, radiofrequency ablation (RFA), uterine fibroid embolization (UFE), and vertebroplasty
- Nuclear medicine, including PET (positron emission tomography)
- Bone densitometry (DEXA scans)
- Neuroradiology
- Womens imaging, including digital mammography with computer-aided detection (CAD), breast MRI, and stereotactic breast biopsy
- Ultrasound, including Doppler studies
- Traditional X-rays

LOCAL BUSINESS. LOCAL EMPLOYEES. FIRST-CLASS HEALTH PLAN.

We're expanding our commitment in Colorado. New medical offices are opening soon in Loveland and Fort Collins, and another is planned for Greeley in 2014. With integrated technologies and dedicated doctors and staff, we've made an investment in quality care that's hard to match. We've also partnered locally with Banner Health for a complete care experience. The result is better overall health for our members — and a healthier, more productive workforce for your company.
